BCA Chapter 2

Dzogchen Khenpo Chöga Rinpoche's Oral Explanations of The Bodhisattvacharyavatara of Shantideva & Khenpo Kunpal’s Commentary on this text known as Drops of Nectar text-sections 69-325 relating to BCA Ch. 2 verse stanzas 1-65

Text section 69:

Śāntideva taught the great benefits of bodhicitta in chapter one of the Bodhisattvacaryāvatāra. His praise for the extraordinary qualities of bodhicitta should make students think, “I want to develop this precious bodhicitta in my mind.” Precious bodhicitta, the thought of freeing all beings from suffering and establishing them on the level of buddhahood, is the most noble of all thoughts, endowed with inconceivable qualities. Without bodhicitta buddhahood cannot be achieved. Before a beginning bodhisattva can give rise to absolute bodhicitta, he must first develop relative bodhicitta. A beginner should consider relative bodhicitta to be extremely precious. He should reflect on how relative bodhicitta arises. Does bodhicitta come about accidentally, without causes and conditions [rgyu med rkyen med], or must the mind be prepared and trained in order to create a mind-set conducive to developing bodhicitta?

The cause [rgyu] for bodhicitta is the accumulation of merit [bsod nams kyi tshogs]. Only if the accumulation of merit has been gathered to some extent can bodhicitta develop in one’s mind. The most effective methods for gathering the accumulation of merit are condensed into a practice called ‘the seven branches’ or ‘the seven sections’ [yan lag bdun pa]. Thus, the practice of the ‘seven sections’ is the direct cause for the rise of bodhicitta.

The condition [rkyen] for the rise of bodhicitta is reliance on a spiritual friend [dge ba’i bshes gnyen], a teacher from whom one receives the bodhisattva precepts [sdom pa len pa]. Once one has received the bodhisattva precepts from a teacher, one must repeatedly retake them oneself mentally from the buddhas and bodhisattvas through a daily practice called ‘the liturgy of receiving the bodhisattva precepts’ [byang sdom len chog]. Diligent beginning bodhisattvas renew their bodhisattva precepts six times every day since a beginner’s mind loses the precepts easily.

The buddhas, bodhisattvas and teachers are the conditions for all happiness [bde ba thams cad kyi rkyen]. They are the condition for the attainment of liberation and omniscience [thar pa dang mam mkhyen thob pa’i rkyen]. The cause for the attainment of happiness, liberation and omniscience is the sublime dharma.

Without the cause of gathering the accumulation of merit and the condition of a spiritual friend, bodhicitta cannot be developed in one’s mind. In other words, a noble thought does not arise easily in the mind of an ordinary person. Even if we understand that a noble mind-set is endowed with qualities and is something desirable, it still does not come about easily. That is why the great Indian master Nāgārjuna said you need to perfect the accumulations!
Asaṅga taught that bodhicitta arises only in a pure mind, never in a polluted mind. Asaṅga said that a pure mind is the cause for bodhicitta. Only a mind that is rooted in ‘the three trainings’ [bslab pa gsum] of a bodhisattva is considered a pure mind. When a practitioner’s mind is not firm in ‘the training of discipline’ [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa], in ‘the training of concentration’ [ting nge ’dzin gyi bslab pa], and in ‘the training of wisdom-knowledge’ [shes rab kyi bslab pa], it will never be pure. The term ‘a pure mind’ [sems dvangs ma] has great meaning. The discipline of a bodhisattva is ‘discipline free from regret’ [’gyod pa med pa’i tshul khrims]. Since he abstains from harming any sentient being, a bodhisattva’s mind no longer experiences regret or guilt about former misdeeds and thus becomes very pure. A beginning bodhisattva must at least maintain (1) ‘the discipline of abstaining from negative conduct’ [nyes spyod sdom pa’i tshul khrims]. A mind polluted with harmful intentions can never give rise to bodhicitta.

Next, a bodhisattva trains in (2) ‘the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas’ [dge ba chos sdu d kyi tshul khrims]. When practicing virtue, however, a bodhisattva must maintain ‘discipline free from arrogance’ [rlom sems pa’i tshul khrims]. A bodhisattva’s mind can easily fall into spiritual arrogance, taking pride in his impeccable conduct, adopting a position of moral superiority. Such a mistaken attitude toward one’s discipline will spoil the purity of one’s mind.

Moreover, a bodhisattva aspires to practice (3) ‘the discipline of fulfilling the benefit of sentient beings’ [sems can don byed kyi tshul khrims]. Without being able to maintain at least the discipline of refraining from negative conduct and the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas free from arrogance, concentration will not arise in a bodhisattva’s mind. A mind ridden with regret, guilt and arrogance can never develop genuine concentration.

Once the bodhisattva’s mind is well-grounded in the three abovementioned disciplines, it will become naturally still, and concentration will arise easily. Out of a mind of stillness and concentration, wisdom-knowledge can easily manifest. Thus, the bodhisattva’s mind will become very peaceful [zhi ba], tame [’dul ba] and relaxed [glod po]. It is further said that a pure mind leads to confidence in the dharma [rig pa dvangs bas chos la nges shes skye].

In addition to guaranteeing that discipline is maintained, practicing methods for gathering the accumulation of merit will make your mind-stream pure [rgyud gtsang ma]. In chapters two and three of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra, Śāntideva teaches eight sections [yan lag brgyad] for gathering the accumulation [tshogs bsags pa] of merit:

1. The section on presenting offerings [mchod pa ’bul ba’i yan lag].
2. The section on paying respect [phyag ’tshal ba’i yan lag].
3. The section on going for refuge [skyabs su ’gro ba’i yan lag].
4. The section on confessing negative deeds [sdig pa bshags pa'i yan lag].
5. The section on rejoicing [rjes su yi rang ba'i yan lag].
6. The section on requesting the buddhas to turn the wheel of dharma [chos 'khor bskor bar bskul ba'i yan lag].
7. The section on requesting the buddhas not to enter into nirvāṇa [mya ngan las mi 'da' bar gsol ba 'debs pa'i yan lag].
8. The section on dedicating the root of virtue for the benefit of others [dge rtsa gzhann don du bngos ba'i yan lag].

Traditionally, this set is called ‘the seven sections’ or ‘the seven branches’ [yan lag bdun pa]. Śāntideva adds refuge as the eighth. Through the practice of the seven or eight sections, the five afflictions [nyon mongs lnga] will be reduced, the accumulation of merit will be gathered in an easy manner, without any hardship, and all obstacles for developing bodhicitta will be removed.

Making offerings [mchod pa 'bul ba] is taught as a remedy for miserliness [ser sna] and as an antidote to the craving of attachment [chags pa'i sred pa]. Paying respect or offering prostrations [phyag 'tshal ba] has the purpose of annihilating pride and arrogance [nga rgyal]. Taking refuge distances one from the wrong paths, and through bodhicitta you distance yourself from the lower paths.

Confession [bshags pa] is an antidote to ignorance [gti mug]. You accept and acknowledge all the mistakes you have committed in this and all former lifetimes based on ego-clinging [bdag 'dzin]. Normally, we cling to our wrong actions and mistakes. Confessing negativity or unskillful volitional action [sdig pa] serves the purpose of annihilating the attachment of clinging to what is wrong [sdug cha la 'dzin pa'i 'dod chags], annihilating the attachment of holding on to what is inferior [dman pa la 'dzin pa sred pa], and annihilating the attachment to ignorance [rmongs pa'i sred pa].

Rejoicing [rjes su yi rang] is an antidote to envy and jealousy [phrag dog]. Envy and jealousy are the fear that others are better than you are, or that others own something you lack. Rejoicing in the qualities, achievements, and merit of others destroys attachment to this fear ['jigs sred]. Requesting the buddhas to turn the wheel of dharma is another remedy for ignorance, since when the buddhas turn the wheel of dharma the sun of wisdom arises.

S supplicating the buddhas not to enter into nirvāṇa is also an antidote to ignorance. Furthermore, it has the purpose of assuring that the Buddha’s teaching remains for a long time. It incorporates as well the request for the longevity of one’s teacher [bla ma] and spiritual guide [dge ba'i bshes gnyen]. The teacher is the root of the dharma. The transmission of the ‘dharma of statements’ [lung gi chos] and the ‘dharma of realization’ [rgtos pa'i chos] is based on one’s teacher and spiritual guide. Without a teacher, one is cut off from the root of the dharma. Therefore, one requests the Dedication is a special feature that distinguishes Buddhism from other spiritual systems. Other spiritual systems do not teach giving to others all the goodness [dge ba] one has acquired through one’s practice. All Buddhist practice must be framed by ‘the three excellences’ [dam pa gsum]: 1) bodhicitta, the excellent beginning [sbyor ba sms 53 ‘Ignorance’ [gti mug] can be translated as ignorance, stupidity, delusion or dullness. It connotes an ignorance that is dull and dark. ‘Ignorance’ or ‘non-awareness’ [ma rig pa] connotes ‘not knowing’ [ha ma go ba], the ‘absence of awareness’. bskyed dam pa; 2) non-conceptual practice, the excellent main part [dngos gzhi dmigs med dam pa]; and 3) dedication, the excellent conclusion [rjes bsngo ba dam pa].

These practices are the outstanding features of Buddha’s teachings. Dedication is considered a supreme method to cut through clinging and fixation [‘dzin pa]. Generally, the terms ‘offering’ [mchod pa], ‘generosity’ [sbyin pa], ‘confession’ [bshags pa], and ‘dedication’ [bsngo ba] have more or less the same connotation. All four practices force you to open your hand and to give something away. Without opening your hand, you cannot offer anything. It is impossible to present a gift and still hold on to it. You must let go of whatever you offer or give away.

The dharma teaches the overcoming of attachment [chags pa] and fixation [‘dzin pa]. If you treasure something very much and hold it most dear [phyogs tu ‘gyur ba la ‘dzin pa], then in order to overcome this fixation, you should present it as an offering. In order to cut fixation to your possessions, donate them to others. That is generosity.

Through confession you distance yourself from holding on to what is inferior [dman pa la ‘dzin pa]. For instance, if you have killed someone you must first realize that you have committed a deed with very negative consequences for yourself. If you want to overcome these consequences, you need to distance yourself from what you have done. The first step is to understand that what you did was a mistake. Then you aspire to rid yourself of this negative action. Confession has the purpose of freeing yourself from all the negative deeds that you have committed in this and all former lifetimes.

Confession means casting away all fixations on negativity that you have been holding in your polluted mind from former lifetimes [tshe sngon nas sdig pa’i sms nang la sdug cha ‘dzin yod pa thams cad].

Through offerings you annihilate your fixation on what you hold most dear, and through confession you annihilate your fixation on your own negative patterns. Presenting offerings, practicing generosity, making confessions and dedicating your merit have a single aim [dmigs yul]—the destruction of fixations [‘dzin pa chad pa’i phyir du]. Training in these four practices loosens up your habit of attachment to the positive as well as the negative. This important advice is imbedded in the teachings of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra.

Śāntideva’s first stanza concerns offerings of things that belong to an owner [bdag pos yongs su bzung ba'i mchod pa], offerings of which you can think, “These belong to me.” This includes things you have bought or received as presents, things you consider to be your personal property. Your personal property is your most treasured possession. Traditionally, the greatest attachment is to precious metals such as gold, and to precious stones. To overcome this strong attachment it is customary to offer gold when requesting teachings from a great master.

If you make an offering in order to overcome your own attachment, you are practicing virtue [dge ba]. However, if you offer your teacher gold, thinking, “I must give him gold to receive these teachings because he likes gold,” you are holding a wrong view, and you accumulate negativity [sdig pa]. For the Buddha whether or not you present offerings makes absolutely no difference. You present offerings only to reduce your own attachment to things you hold dear. This is a very important point.

Text section 70:

Among all accumulations of merit, presenting offerings is said to be the greatest. For this reason Atiśa refused to give the bodhisattva vows easily. When his students requested the bodhisattva precepts, he said, “Set up offerings!” When the students had laid some offerings out, he told them, “That won’t do!” After refusing the students a few times, he finally and reluctantly [da gzod] agreed to give the bodhisattva precepts. Atiśa insisted on perfect offerings because beautifully arrayed offerings generate purity of mind. Any beautiful arrangement inspires and calms the mind. The devotional act of arranging offerings opens the mind and creates a serene atmosphere.

Text section 72 / stanza 1:

For your offering to be meritorious you must present it with the three-fold purity or the three-fold perfection [yang dag pa mam pa gsum]: pure motivation [bsam pa dag pa], pure object [zhing dag pa], and pure substance [dngos po dag pa]. You need a pure motivation for making offerings [mchod pa’i smsn mam par dag pa] so that 1) the negative deeds [sdig pa] and obscurations [sgrib pa] of yourself and others will be purified, and 2) so that the merit and wisdom that lie dormant in everybody’s mind will be actualized. You present offerings without being stingy, without being proud, without showing off or trying to impress anyone. Do not present offerings to make a big name for yourself. If you present offerings with the intention of becoming famous, your amount of merit will be very small. This kind of offering is called a ‘pretentious offering’ [ngom mchod], given to aquire fame. Present offerings without jealousy [phrag dog] or competitiveness, without the attitude: “That person gave so much, I can’t stand it. I should outdo him and present more.”
You should rather present the offerings with a pure motivation, such as, “I present this offering to the Buddha so that this precious bodhicitta may arise in the minds of all beings.” The attitude of bodhicitta and a mind involved in ego-clinging [bdag ’dzin], such as a mind concerned with fame and good reputation, contradict each other.

Ego-clinging focuses on oneself, while bodhicitta focuses on others.

You need a ‘pure object to which you offer’ [mchod yul rnam par dag pa]. The three jewels [dkon mchog gsum] are such a pure object. You should not present offerings to inferior objects like demons and spirits. They can be the recipient of your generosity but not of your offerings. Presenting offerings to spirits will never give the same results as presenting an offering to the three jewels.

The three jewels are Buddha, dharma and saṅgha. The Sanskrit word ‘buddha’ primarily means ‘realization’ [rtogs pa], the realization of the natural state. It also connotes ‘awakening from sleep’ [gnyid sad pa] and ‘unfolding’ or ‘opening up’, like the unfolding [rgyas pa] of a lotus flower. The Buddha has awakened from all sleep states of ignorance [ma rig pa’i gnyid thams cad sangs], and his mind has opened up to all fields of knowledge [shes bya thams cad la blo rgyas pa]. Buddha’s realization has unfolded like a lotus flower that has risen above the swamp.

The tathāgatas [de bzhin gshegs pa rnam] are those who have gone in accord with the natural state as it (actually) is [chos nyid de bzhin nyid dang rjes su mthun par gshegs pa]. Because the Buddha has realized the natural state as it is, he is called the Tathāgata. As he has himself realized without any error the natural state as it is [chos nyid de bzhin nyid], he can help others achieve this same view. ‘Gone’ [gshegs pa] connotes ‘realization’ [rtogs pa] and ‘knowledge’ [mkhyen pa]. The Tathāgata is the one who ‘has gone’ to the view of the natural state as it is, who ‘has realized’ the natural state as it is. Thus, the term ‘tathāgata’ means ‘the one who has realized the natural state as it actually is’.

The term ‘the natural state’ [chos nyid] is synonymous with ‘the expanse of truth’ [chos kyi dbyings; skr. dharma] and with ‘the expanse of emptiness’ [stong pa nyid gyi dbyings]. It is a state free from all elaborations [spros bral] and free from all philosophical positions [mtha’ bral].

The dharma has two aspects: the truth of cessation [’gog bden] and the truth of the path [lam bden]. That which frees one from attachment is the truth of the path [gang gis chags pa dang bral bar byed pa lam gyi bden pa], and that which is free from all fixations is the truth of cessation [gang zhig ’dzin pa thams cad dang bral song ba ’di ’gog pa’i bden pa]. The truth of the path is non-defiling wisdom [zag med shes rab], the wisdom that realizes egolessness [bdag med rtags pa’i shes rab tshul ldan dang bcas pa lam gyi bden pa].

Cessation in the context of the Hinayāna teachings is the disruption of saṃsāra’s continuity [‘khor ba’i rgyun chad pa]. Any cause for taking rebirth within saṃsāra has been eradicated. In the context of the Mahāyāna teachings, cessation refers to the wisdom of the Buddha [sangs rgyas kyi ye shes].

The Mahāyāna saṃgha refers to the ‘sons of the victors’, the bodhisattvas, from the first level [sa; skr. bhumi] onward. The most prominent members of the Mahāyāna saṃgha are the ‘eight great close sons’, the tenth level bodhisattvas who constantly stayed with the Buddha. They are called the ‘eight close sons’ because they reached the tenth bodhisattva level and are thus close to the level of Buddha’s realization. They are also called the ‘sons of the Victor’ [rgyal ba’i sras; skr. jinaputra] because they are considered to be Buddha’s heart sons [thugs kyi sras].

The eight great close sons [nye ba’i sras chen brgyad] are: Maṇjuśrī [‘jam dbyangs], Vajrapāṇi [phyag na rdo rje], Avalokiteśvara [spyan ras gzigs dbang phyug], Kṣitigarbha [sa yi snying po], Sarvanīvaraṇavīśambhī [sgrīb pa thams cad mam par sel ba], Ākāśagarbha [nam mkha’i snying po], Maitreya [byams pa] and Samantabhadra [kun tu bzang po].

Bodhisattvas aspire with relentless courage to unexcelled enlightenment. They are the descendants of the Buddha; empowered with the treasury of the sublime dharma, they are the custodians of all remaining beings, and it is they who will take over the kingdom of inconceivable wisdom. Thus, they are called the ‘children of the Victor’ [rgyal ba’i sras]. There are four factors that establish the father-child relationship between the Buddha and the bodhisattvas:

1. They are Buddha’s descendants [rgyal ba’i gdung ’dzin pa] because they traverse the path to enlightenment and uphold his lineage without interruption, just as the child of a king upholds the family lineage.

2. They have power over the treasury of the sublime dharma [dam pa’i chos kyi mdzod la dbang ba], having inherited all of Buddha’s teachings, just as the child of a king inherits the treasury of the kingdom. They also transmit the teachings of the Buddha to others.

3. They are the guardians of all remaining beings [gdul bya’i lhag ma skyong ba]. After the Buddha’s nirvāṇa, they undertake to care for all future sentient beings.

4. They are the ones suited to inherit the kingdom of inconceivable wisdom [bsam mi khyab pa'i ye shes kyi rgyal thabs la dbang du bsgyur du rung ba]. They all will attain the inconceivable wisdom of the Buddha, complete enlightenment.

First, the Buddha plants the seed of the family [rigs kyi sa bon bsruk pa]. At the very beginning, when the Buddha taught his bodhisattva students, he made them develop the seed of virtue and bodhicitta. He then furthers renunciation and realization, continuing to guide them along the paths and levels. Like a father who feeds and raises his children, he is always there to help and guide the bodhisattvas.

Finally, when they have reached the tenth bodhisattva level, he empowers them as dharma kings [chos kyi rgyal po] through the ‘great empowerment of light rays’ ['od zer chen po'i dbang bskur]. This is like handing over the power to a royal child, empowering the crown prince to be king. Without such empowerment the bodhisattvas cannot attain enlightenment. This describes the ‘pure object’, the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Text section 75 / stanza 1:

Furthermore, you need ‘pure offering substance’ [mchod gyi dngos po mam par dag pa]. What you offer must be untainted by negative deeds and should not be inferior. Do not offer your cheapest or ugliest possession, but rather your most valuable and appreciated objects. Offer that to which you cling the most.

As for the manner of offering [mchod pa phul tshul], you should arrange the seven offerings bowls [bdun tshar] and a lamp [mar me] in a beautiful fashion. Clean your shrine and the offering articles, and fill the vessels with clean and fresh substances. Do not consciously offer dirty or old things.

The term noble substance [rgyu bzang ba] refers to something that is not acquired through negative deeds [sdig pa]. A noble substance must have a pure origin.

The offerings should not be made to serve one’s pride [nga rgyal] or to serve pretentiousness in offerings [ngom mchod]. Some people make spectacular offerings, aiming to display their wealth and piety, hoping to impress other people and be praised. They want to make sure that they give the most lavish amount of offerings and that their great generosity is widely acknowledged. Such an offering furthers pride and arrogance rather than reducing attachment and fixation.

Offerings should not be tainted by miserliness [ser sna]. Practitioners should not save money and time by presenting inexpensive items and holding back precious things. When your most cherished objects are offered, the offering becomes a remedy against miserliness. You should also not develop a miserly attitude when you see other people making vast offerings. Don’t think, “Why are they wasting so much money on offerings!” This attitude is called malevolence [’jur ’gegs], disliking that other people make offerings and causing obstacles against their generosity [gzhan gyis sbyin pa gtong ba la gegs byed pa].

The term miserliness [ser sna] describes a person who does not want to part with any of his own possessions. The term malevolence [’jur ’gegs] refers to someone who cannot bear to see other people use their possessions and wealth on offerings, donations and so forth, and who even feels miserly regarding other people’s wealth. Offerings should be presented in a mindful and alert manner. Arrange the offerings beautifully, with a pure mind infused with respect and devotion. Avoid carelessness, disrespect and any negative state of mind as this will create only negative karma.

Text section 76:

Carefully arranging your offerings is a way of keeping discipline. Lay out the clean offering bowls side by side, neither too close nor too far apart. They should be straight, with none out of line. The water should be clean with no grains, hair, dust or insects floating in it. The bowls should be filled with care, full but not quite to the brim, avoiding spilling any water on the offering table.

In the morning you should set out the seven offering bowls and the butter lamp from right to left, as seen from the perspective of the shrine. When you empty out the bowls in the evening you begin from the left and work your way to the right, again as seen from the perspective of the shrine. It is said that you leave the distance of one barley grain length between each of the offering bowls and should fill the bowls with water up to one barley grain length below the brim.

1. The first bowl contains water that represents the clean, sweet-tasting drinking water [mchod yon; skr. argham] that is offered to the mouths of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

2. The second bowl also contains water, representing the pure and refreshing water for washing [zhabs bsil; skr. padam] that is offered to the feet and hands of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

3. The third bowl is filled with rice and has a flower placed in it. This represents a blooming flower [me tog; skr. pushpe] and is offered to the eyes of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

4. The fourth is a bowl again filled with rice and with incense sticks planted in it. It represents the fine smelling incense [gdug spo; skr. dhupe] offered to the noses of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

5. The fifth offering is the butter lamp vessel [mar me kong bu] filled with melted butter or oil and containing a wick [sdong bu]. A candle will do just as well. This illuminating lamp [mar me; skr. aloe] is offered to the eyes (mind) (????) of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

6. The sixth offering is a bowl filled with scented water representing fragrant perfume [dri chab; skr. gandhe] and is offered to the bodies of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

7. The seventh offering is a bowl of rice with a small food torma\textsuperscript{55} placed on top of it, representing the food [zhal zas; skr. naividya] offered to the mouths of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

8. The eighth offering is a bowl of rice with two cymbals [ting shags] placed on top of it, representing music [rol mo; skr. shapda] offered to the ears of the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

To simplify, you may also just offer clean water and a butter lamp. After you have set up the offering bowls you should recite OM AH HUNG a few times, while sprinkling a few drops of clean water on the offering bowls with a strand of kusha grass that you hold in your right hand. This will bring the blessings of Buddha’s body, speech and mind down and will dispel any demons or spirits that might be near the offerings. Imagine that you are offering all various offering substances, which will be described later in the text, to the buddhas and bodhisattvas and consider that they actually accept the offerings. Imagine further that they grant their blessings to you and all sentient beings. That is what you should keep in mind every morning when you offer the seven bowls and the butter lamp or candle.

These simple ways of presenting offerings are primarily designed to remedy miserliness and gather the accumulation of merit. Through this merit you will be able to generate kindness and compassion in your mind. You will be able to generate bodhicitta.

\textsuperscript{55} A torma in Tibetan culture is an offering cake made of dough. Today, a cookie or something similar will serve just as well.

Whatever we cling to will bring us suffering. Eventually, we will lose whatever we hold dear. It is a law of impermanence that whatever comes together will be dispersed. A practitioner who has cut through all clinging and fixation has nothing left to lose.

Someone who is truly free from all clinging and fixation, can experience all phenomena as if they belonged to him. Therefore, it is said: “Whatever you give away is yours. Whatever you hold on to belongs to others.” Anything you can lose belongs to others. If you have nothing to lose, everything belongs to you.

Text section 77:

Offerings that do not belong to an owner are those things such as mountains, lakes, rivers and so forth, which do not belong to anyone. With regard to such objects people think, “They are not mine.”

In general, presenting offerings that belong to an owner is said to remedy clinging to a personal identity [gang zag gi bdag ’dzin] and presenting offerings that do not belong to an owner is a remedy for clinging to the identity of phenomena [chos kyi bdag ’dzin].

There are two kinds of remedies: gross remedies [rags pa sgo nas kyi gnyen po] and remedies that eradicate something from the very root [rtsa ba drung ’byin gyi gnyen po]. These two kinds of offerings, offerings that belong to an owner and offerings that do not belong to an owner, are considered gross remedies and will only weaken the two types of ego-clinging to some extent; they do not annihilate ego-clinging completely. The true remedy against both types of ego-clinging is only the wisdom that realizes egolessness [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab]. This wisdom completely eradicates both types of ego-clinging from the very root.

Ego-clinging [bdag ’dzin] implies holding something as real [bden par ’dzin pa]. To actually believe that you have an identity, to identify yourself with a position and act upon it, is called clinging to a subject, clinging to the identity of a person. To truly believe that the material world is real and physically exists is called clinging to objects, clinging to the identity of phenomena.

Offerings that do not belong to an owner do not require detailed and lengthy visualization [bskyed rim]. You need not even evoke a mental picture. Simply reading or reciting the description of these offerings mindfully is sufficient. One must understand what is meant by vastness. Your offerings should be not only as vast as the ‘the third order of a thousand world systems’ [stong gsum ‘jig rten], which are one billion world systems, but as vast as the ‘Great Glacial Ocean of Vairocana’ [rnam snang gangs chen mtsho]. Offer everything beautiful and precious that could possibly exist in all oceanic world systems.

The Buddha manifests on the saṃbhogakāya level as Buddha Vairocana, named ‘Great Glacial Ocean Vairocana’ [rnam snang gangs chen mtsho]. This saṃbhogakāya buddha is also undifferentiated from all the buddhas of the ten directions. Within each pore of his body infinite world systems appear, and within each atom of these worlds is an infinity of other worlds and infinite forms of Vairocana. Each form of Vairocana 168 Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations in turn contains infinite buddhas and buddha fields. Vairocana encompasses the entire universe, and the entire universe constitutes Vairocana.

Our world system, called the ‘world system of endurance’ [mi møjed 'jig rten gyi khams, skr. saha loca dhatu], is an infinitely small particle within these oceanic world systems. Vairocana’s palm holds twenty-five lotuses, stacked one on top of the other, each of which contains billions of trichiliocosms. On the thirteenth lotus tier, our trichiliocosm is merely one among billions. One trichiliocosm equal to one billion world systems and is the field of influence of one nirmāṇakāya, in our case the Buddha Śākyamuni.

Visualize all kinds of beautiful flowers, such as white, yellow, red and blue lotuses, all kinds of fruits and medicinal plants, all kinds of precious stones and gems from the worlds of gods, humans and nāgas.

Imagine the four great descending rivers ['bab chu bzhi] that spring from the four sides of Lake Manasarovar [mtsho ma dros pa / mtsho ma pham] next to Mount Kailāśa. The river Ganga to the east springs from an elephant mouth [glang chen kha nas 'bab]. The river Sindhu to the south springs from the mouth of a peacock [rma bya'i kha nas 'bab]. The river Vakṣu to the west springs from the mouth of a horse [rta yi kha nas 'bab], and the river Sītā to the north springs from a lion’s mouth.

Thus, imagine lakes, ponds and rivers of pure water endowed with the following eight qualities [yan lag brgyad ldan gyi chu]: (1) cooling [bsil ba], (2) good-tasting or sweettasting [zhim pa / mngar ba], (3) light [yang ba], (4) soft ['jam pa], (5) clear [dvangs pa], (6) unstained or clean [gri ma med pa / gtsang ba], (7) not harmful for the stomach [lto la mi gnod pa], and (8) not harmful for the throat [mrin pa la mi gnod pa]. Imagine many medicinal substances such as the ‘six excellent substances’ [bzang po drug]: (1) nutmeg, which is excellent for the heart [dza ti snying gi bzang po], (2) bamboo manna, which is excellent for the lungs [cu gang glo ba'i bzang po], (3) saffron, which is excellent for the liver [gur gum mchin pa'i bzang po], (4) cloves, which are excellent for the arteries [li shi srog rtsa'i bzang po], (5) cardamom, which is excellent for the kidneys [sug smel mkhal ba'i bzang po], and (6) castor oil, which is excellent for the spleen [ka ko la mtshur pa'i bzang po]. Offering medicinal plants to the Buddha generates great merit.

One will be free of diseases in future lifetimes and will also have the capacity to alleviate the sickness of others through medicine.

You may imagine the ‘five precious substances’ [rin chen sna lnga]: gold [gser], silver [dngul], turquoise [g.yu], coral [byu ru] and pearl [mu tig], also listed as gold, silver, copper [zangs], iron [lcags] and tin [gsha' tshe]. Imagine the ‘five kinds of grain’ ['bru sna 56 The third order of a thousand world systems [ston gsum] or one trichiliocosm means 1,000 to the power of three, which equals one billion single world systems.

Inga: barley [nas], rice ['bras], wheat [gro], peas [sran ma] and sesame [til] or alternatively: wheat, barley, peas, buckwheat [bra bo] and oats [so ba]. Further, imagine the ‘three medicinal fruits’ ['bras bu gsum]: arura [a ru ra], barura [ba ru ra] and kyurora [skyu ro ra].

Imagine beautiful or pleasing lakes such as the seven pleasure lakes [rol pa'i mtho bdun] on top of Mount Sumeru. They are: (1) the salt lake [tshva'i mtsho], (2) the wine lake [chang gi mtsho], (3) the water lake [chu'i mtsho], (4) the milk lake ['o ma'i mtsho], (5) the yogurt lake [zho'i mtsho], (6) the butter lake [mar gyi mtsho], and (7) the honey lake [sbrang rtsi'i mtsho].

Visualize beautiful jewel mountains [rin chen ri bo] composed of various precious metals and stones, for example the seven golden mountains on top of Mount Sumeru:

(1) Rim holder [mu khyud 'dzin], (2) Bent [mam 'dud], (3) Horse Ear [rta ma], (4) Pleasant to Look at [ita na sduc], (5) Forest of Acacia Trees [seng ldeng can], (6) Plough Holder [gshol mda' 'dzin], and (7) Yoke Holder [gnya' shing 'dzin]. (???) Sanskrit names. Mount Sumeru, the king of all mountains, is made of four precious substances [rin chen sna bszi las grub pa ri'i rgyal po ri rab]: silver in the east [shar dngul], beryl [lo' vaidurya] in the south, ruby in the west [nub pad ma ra ga], and gold in the north [byang gser]. (???)

The entire space on each side of Mount Sumeru shines with the respective color of that side of the mountain. That is why the sky above our continent, Jambudvīpa in the south [lo' dza'm bu gling] is blue. As space itself has no color, the blue appearance of the sky is called the ‘ornamentation of space’ [rgyan gyi nam mkha'].

Think of remote forests, vast pastures and beautiful parks inhabited by multi-colored birds and tame antelopes. Bring to mind trees bedecked with flowers and laden with fragrant fruit, permeating the whole area with wonderful smells and aromas. Visualize beautiful and remote forest clearings [nags tshal gyi mthongs], where animals graze amidst sandalwood trees.

Text sections 82 / stanza 4:

Offer the best fragrances of the worlds of gods, men and nāgas, natural incense [lhan skyes kyi spos] and manufactured incense [sbyar byung gi spos]. Recall the wish-fulfilling tree of the god realms, which immediately grants all wishes. Think of jewel trees like those found in Sukhāvatī [bde ba chen], the buddha field of Buddha Amitābha ['od dpag
Imagine offering anything to be offered to the three jewels.

The seven precious substances [rin po che sna bdun] are: 1) ruby [pad ma ra ga], 2) sapphire [indranila], 3) beryl [vaidurya], 4) emerald [mar gad], 5) diamond [rdo rje pha lam], 6) pearl [mu tig], and 7) coral [byu ru]. Alternatively they are: 1) beryl [bai dur ya], 2) gold [gsers], 3) silver [dngul], 4) crystal [rdo shel], 5) quartz [spug], 6) red pearl [mu tig dmar po], and 7) emerald [rdo'i snying po / mar gad].

Text sections 83-84 / stanza 5:

Offer beautiful lakes and pools adorned with lotuses where various water birds, wild geese and swans, swim majestically and sing melodious songs in the most beautiful voices. Tibet’s four great and famous lakes [grags pa’i mtsho chen bzhi] are: Manasarovar [mtsho ma pham], Tengri Nor [gnam mtsho], Yardrok [yar ‘brog mtsho] and Kokonor [mtsho sngon po].

Visualize all beautiful objects, everything that exists within the infinite reaches of space. Imagine sun, moon and sparkling stars. Think of all the treasures and works of art; think of good-looking men and women. You may even offer the Buddha, bodhisattvas, arhats, and pratyekabuddhas to the three jewels. You may offer all the merit and goodness that exists in all infinite world systems to the Buddha, dharma and sangha. Offer everything that does not belong to an owner. Do not think,

“Because they don’t belong to me, I can’t offer them.”

Offerings that do not belong to an owner have the special distinction of faultlessness or ‘the special distinction of being free from misdeeds’ [kha na ma tho ba med pa’i khyad par], just like the riches of the northern continent Kurava [byang sgra mi snyan], a continent mentioned in Indian legend and cosmology. The distinction of being free from misdeeds means that all things that do not belong to an owner are free from negativity [sdig pa med pa], as they cannot be the object of quarrels. It is said that the people from the northern continent Kurava eat wild rice which is not ploughed or sown, their clothes and ornaments come from the wish-fulfilling tree [dpag bsam gyi shing] and the noble vase [bum pa bzang po]. Whatever they think of or wish for manifests instantaneously.

The term ‘misdeed’ [kha na ma tho ba] actually means ‘an unreported misdeed’, ‘a misdeed that has been kept secret’, ‘a misdeed that was left untold’, literally, ‘something that has not reached the mouth’. Buddhist practitioners, particularly monks, must confess all their misdeeds by admitting them openly and spelling them out. All that is kept secret and not confessed will not be purified. Remaining a misdeed, its karmic fruition will eventually ripen.

Misdeeds are of two types: ‘misdeeds of violating a natural law’ [rang bzhin gyi kha na ma tho ba] and ‘misdeeds of breaking an established rule’ [bcas pa’i sdiṅ pa]. Violating a natural law means commiting any of the ten non-virtuous actions [mi dge ba bcu]. Breaking an established rule refers to breaking rules that were created by the Buddha for the saṅgha, like the rule against monks eating after noon.

Text sections 85 / stanza 6:

Offer all that was discussed above by mentally creating it, and imagining that it is actually yours. Thinking, “I offer all this to the supreme among all humans, to the sublime Buddha Śākyamuni. I offer all this to his heart sons, the bodhisattvas, the sublime saṅgha. I offer all this to the sublime dharma, which dwells in the mind of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. All this I offer with heartfelt devotion and in the most excellent way to the three jewels. Great compassionate ones, please accept my offering and consider me with your great kindness so that the precious bodhicitta takes birth in my mind for the sake of all sentient beings.” Visualize that the three jewels actually accept your offerings with great delight and that they shower you with their blessings. In general the practice of making offerings is designed to loosen up attachment and also to gather the accumulation of merit [bsod nams kyi tshogs]. In particular, the purpose of presenting these offerings that do not belong to an owner is to reduce one’s clinging to objects, one’s clinging to the existence of phenomena [chos kyi bdag ‘dzin]. You totally disown anything you could possibly become attached to by offering it to the three jewels.

Once you have given something away, you should not think about it any longer. Often, however, when we give someone a precious gift, we continue to worry about whether our gift is being treated with the proper respect and used as we intended. Our attachment to something that we have given away shows that we have not really disowned it. We might have given the object away, but we have severed neither our attachment [chags pa] to it nor our fixation [’dzin pa] on it. Our mind is still following the object and we continue to try to control how it is handled.

Truly giving something away, truly offering something, means totally disowning it. Whether or not the recipient treats your gift with respect or throws it away is no longer your concern. The moment you offer or give something away, your concern about it must cease. In Tibet there is a saying: “Once the torma has been thrown out, it makes no difference if it’s eaten by dogs or birds.” If you really know how to disown what you offer, then making offerings becomes a supreme means of gathering merit.

We make offerings and pray so that the precious bodhicitta will be born in our minds. Understand bodhicitta in two ways: in its aspect of compassion [snying rje] and in its aspect of knowledge [shes rab]. What is the special compassion unique to the bodhicitta motivation? With compassion one focuses on benefiting others [snying rjes gzhان don la dmigs pa] through the steadfast resolve: “I will free all beings from suffering.” This is the compassion aspect of the bodhicitta motivation.

What, then, is the knowledge aspect of the bodhicitta motivation? With knowledge one focuses on perfect enlightenment [shes rab kyi sbyang bya dmigs pa] through the similar resolve: “I will establish all sentient beings on the level of perfect enlightenment.” Relative bodhicitta is conceptual compassion and conceptual knowledge, while absolute bodhicitta, self-existing wisdom [rang byung ye shes], is nonconceptual compassion and non-conceptual wisdom-knowledge.

Relative bodhicitta is the wish to liberate all sentient beings from suffering and to establish them on the level of perfect enlightenment. This is the most noble of all thoughts as it combines compassion and knowledge.

Knowledge [shes rab] here means the knowledge of the infinite suffering of beings as well as the knowledge of the qualities of the three jewels. Such knowledge always inherently contains compassion. The bodhisattva knows why beings must be liberated from suffering and he knows what will liberate them—the dharma. He knows that the root of all suffering is clinging to an ego. He knows that ego-clinging is a momentary concept [glo bur gyi mam rtog], and he understands that the ceaseless perpetuation of this momentary thought, this momentary clinging to an ego, causes beings infinite suffering.

The bodhisattva has the knowledge of egolessness, of buddha nature. He understands that ‘ego’ or ‘identity’ ultimately does not exist. He understands that he and all beings are caught up in delusion. Therefore, he naturally has the wish to free beings [bsgral ‘dod gyi blo] from the delusion of ego-clinging, from suffering. He understands the necessity of liberation for all beings including himself.

Bodhicitta means to know why all beings must be liberated and to feel compassion for them. If one wishes to liberate only oneself from suffering, that attitude is not bodhicitta. Wishing to attain liberation only for oneself shows continued involvement in ego-clinging. The thought, “I want to be free,” is based on ego-clinging; with this kind of attitude a practitioner will not be able to free his mind.

Text section 86 / stanza 6:

The Buddha is called the Muni, the capable one [thub pa], who is able to perform the activities of body, speech and mind without being on guard. Muni means ‘able to do’ [byed thub pa]. ‘Unguarded’ [bsgral ba med pa], or the ‘three-fold way of being unguarded’ [bsgral ba med pa sman gsum], refers to the qualities of the Buddha. As the Buddha does not have the slightest defect [skyon] in body, speech and mind, he need not be on guard, he need not be shy [‘dzem pa med pa] in front of others, nor need he pay conscious attention [gzab gzab med pa] to his actions. We ordinary people must be on guard when we act. If we are not careful, we will make mistakes. Buddha performs his activities naturally [rang bzhin gyis]. As he is utterly free from any defects, he has nothing to hide [sbas pa med pa]. The Buddha has no basis for making mistakes [nor ba’i rgyu med] since his activities of body, speech and mind are utterly perfect.

The way to offer ['bul ba’i tshul] all the various offerings listed in the root text is by creating them mentally [blo yis blangs nas]. The statement, “I offer them in an excellent way” [legs par] means with faith [dad pa] and respect [gus pa], with the purity of the three factors ['khor gsum rnam dag]. The ‘purity of the three factors’ means freedom from fixation on a subject who offers, an object offered to, and the act of offering. There are four special distinctions [khyad par] concerning all offerings that do not have an owner: (1) The special distinction concerning the amount [grangs kyi khyad par] of these offerings is that one may offer all that exists within the reaches of space; the offerings are unlimited. (2) The special distinction concerning the faultlessness [kha na ma tho ba med pa’i khyad par] of these offerings is that they are not acquired through negativity such as killing, stealing and the like. (3) The special distinction concerning the presentation of [sbyor ba’i khyad par] these offerings is that they are ‘created mentally’ [blo yis blangs nas]. (4) The special distinction concerning the object [zhing gi khyad par] of offering is that all these are presented to the three jewels.

The three jewels are the sacred recipients of gifts [yon gnas dam pa]. In this context Khenpo Kunpal quotes from the ‘Sūtra of Recollecting the Three Jewels’ [dkon mchog gsum rjes su dran pa’i mdo]: “They are the perfect recipients of gifts” [yon yongs su sbyong ba chen po]. Not everyone is a perfect recipient of gifts, but the three jewels can receive any offerings and remain uncorrupted.

When presenting offerings, a pure motivation and mind are most important. Then, even if you present the Buddha with only a small offering, you will still receive a great benefit. Once a merchant [shong dpon] called Udākarika offered seven peas [sran rdog bdun] to Buddha Vipaśyin [sangs rgyas rnam gzigs] and put them in his begging bowl. Later, he became the world monarch known as King Māndhāta [mi dbang nga las nu].58 On another occasion, a few children were playing when the Buddha walked by. The moment they saw the Buddha, one child thought, “I should offer some food to the Buddha.” He placed a handful of sand on a stone and presented it to the Buddha. The Buddha accepted the offering, and allowed the child to throw a handful of sand in his begging bowl. Then he predicted that a hundred years after the Buddha’s nirvāṇa, this child would become the dharma king Aśoka [chos rgyal mya ngan med].59 This reveals the power of a pure motivation or intent when making offerings to the purest object, the Buddha.
Text sections 88-89 / stanza 7:

“My offerings are small as I am destitute of merit. But please accept these offerings for my own sake [bdag gi don slad du], so that I may generate bodhicitta in my mind, free all beings from suffering, and establish them on the level of perfect buddhahood. Please, buddhas and bodhisattvas, accept these offerings with the inconceivable and miraculous power of your body, speech and mind.” Thus, by offering all the wonderful things that we can imagine to exist in the world, we can still make perfect offerings, even if we are poor and lack the perfect offering substances.

Merit is gathered through virtuous conduct, performing the ten virtuous actions [dge ba bcu], practicing the six transcendental perfections and so forth. The supreme way of gathering merit is presenting offerings.

We have the opportunity to easily gain great merit by presenting offerings to the Buddha. It does not matter that Buddha is no longer physically present in this world. His wisdom body is beyond time, beyond proximity and distance. If you present a mentally created offering to the Buddha with heartfelt devotion, as taught above, you will gain inconceivable merit.

174 Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations

The merit and benefit of having presented an offering to the Buddha in person two thousand five hundred years ago and presenting an offering nowadays to a stūpa containing his relics or remains is totally equal. Even if you simply visualize the Buddha and present offerings to him, the merit is equal to presenting it to him in person. Buddha’s wisdom body pervades all time and space. He will at all times and at all places accept a heartfelt offering. The main point is to present the offering with sincere joy and devotion.

Because we did not present many offerings in former lifetimes we are destitute of merit in this life and might lack material wealth. Therefore, we have no choice other than to present offerings that do not belong to an owner. Present offerings with the thought, “In order that I may gather the two accumulations, purify the two obscurations and generate the precious bodhicitta in my mind, please accept with your great love and kindness this offering, which includes everything beautiful and worthy to offer that exists in this world.”

When you gather the accumulations and purify the obscurations, realization of wisdom will dawn. Gathering the accumulation of merit gathers the causes for recognizing wisdom, which is the accumulation of wisdom. The accumulation of conceptual merit [dmigs bcas bsod nams kyi tshogs] belongs to the category of relative truth, while the accumulation of non-conceptual wisdom [dmigs med ye shes kyi tshogs] belongs to the category of absolute truth.

As we gather the accumulations of merit, we become more and more capable of pacifying all disharmonious situations. Our minds become relaxed, and a charismatic confidence [spobs pa] is born. When the mind has gained this charismatic confidence, recognition of the absolute truth, non-conceptual wisdom, becomes easy. As it is said:

As far as the ultimate, the co-emergent wisdom, is concerned, Know that it is foolish to rely upon any methods other than Practices for gathering the accumulations and purifying obscurations, As well as the blessings of the glorious root guru.
don dam lhan cig skyes pa’i ye shes ni tshogs bsags sgrib pa dag pa’i lag rjes dang dpal ldan bla ma’i byin rabs kho na las thabs gzhan brten pa rmongs par shes par bya

As you gather the two accumulations, the two obscurations are naturally purified. Clinging to a subject, holding on to a personal identity [gang zag gi bdag ’dzin], is the root of the obscuration of afflictions [nyon mongs kyi sgrib pa]. Clinging to objects [chos kyi bdag ’dzin] is the root of the obscuration of cognition [shes bya’i sgrib pa]. Through the practice of presenting offerings that have an owner, you train in the antidote to clinging to a subject. Through the practice of presenting offerings that do not have an owner, you train in the antidote to clinging to an object. Presenting offerings cannot by itself destroy subject-object clinging, but it does reduce clinging. Only non-conceptual wisdom can truly destroy subject-object clinging.

Text section 90 / stanza 8:

We are attached to what is close to us and are not attached to what is distant. Our body is very close to us and we therefore treasure it greatly. To cut through this attachment, we offer our present body and the bodies of all future lifetimes to the buddhas and bodhisattvas. We need not offer our bodies from past lives as they have turned into corpses and have already decomposed; we have no attachment to them. Beg the buddhas and bodhisattvas to accept the offering of your body. Beg them to accept you as their subject [’bangs], their servant [g.yog po].
Buddha is called the Victor [rgyal ba] because he is victorious over the four māras [bdud bzhi], the four evil ones, which are: the māra of afflictions [nyon mongs pa’i bdud], the māra of the son of the gods [hā’i bu yi bdud], which means procrastination, the māra of death [’chi bdag gi bdud], and the māra of the skandhas [phung po’i bdud].
The ‘sons of the Victor’ [rgyas sras] are the great bodhisattvas such as the ‘Three Lords of the Families’ [rigs gsum mgon po]: Mañjuśrī [’jam dpal dbyangs], Avalokiteśvara [spyan ras gzigs dbang phyug], and Vajrapāṇi [phyay na rdo rje].

The bodhisattvas are called ‘heroic beings’ [sems dpa’] because they are unafraid of remaining in saṃsāra to liberate all sentient beings from suffering. How does a bodhisattva achieve such courage [dpa’], heroism [dpa’ bo] or charismatic certainty [spobs pa]? A bodhisattva achieves these qualities through the realization of egolessness [dag med rtogs pa], non-dual bodhicitta [gnyis su med pa byang chub sms]. As long as one clings to ego, that kind of courage cannot arise.

Text sections 91-92 / stanza 9:

Not only shall I become the servant of all buddhas and bodhisattvas, but I shall also become the servant of all sentient beings. To have the attitude, “I am the servant of all sentient beings,” is a very noble thought. “Whatever work they give me or is needed, I will do it,” is the attitude of the bodhisattvas. The perfect Buddha has only one function—to serve all beings. The true and heartfelt interest of a buddha is to help sentient beings. A buddha does not in fact need any servants because buddhas are the servants of all beings.

As bodhisattva trainees, we should try not to harm any being in the slightest and, in addition, we must try to help them whenever we can. A true bodhisattva would rather die than harm any being. This requires courage. That kind of attitude delights the buddhas. To delight the buddhas, you must become the servant of all beings. Even while still dwelling in saṃsāra, you will not shy away from helping beings, and you will not fear remaining in saṃsāra to serve them. All you think about is benefiting others in manifold ways. The task of a bodhisattva is to free all beings from suffering and to establish them on the level of complete buddhahood. A bodhisattva is not afraid to remain in saṃsāra to accomplish that purpose.

Even as a beginner, do not be intimidated about promising to help and serve all beings. That thought and a sincere attitude lead to the gathering of merit. The mere thought, “I will liberate all sentient beings from the infinite suffering of saṃsāra and establish them on the level of complete enlightenment” carries inconceivable merit. Whether or not you can actually do this right now, is irrelevant; as a bodhisattva you need that thought. This mere thought brings with it the same merit as actually liberating all beings from the bonds of saṃsāra.

The Buddha himself has no function other than to serve and help beings. He opens up the minds of all beings, from miserable beings in the hell realms to tenth level bodhisattvas. The Buddha has no preferences at all, serving the greatest bodhisattva and the lowest being equally, without making any distinction. He has not the slightest bias toward tenth level bodhisattvas. However, since the Buddha teaches all beings according to their capacity, he teaches tenth level bodhisattvas differently from beings in the hell realms.

Offering one’s body means promising to use your body in all future lifetimes as a vehicle to serve the Buddha. You promise to listen to whatever the Buddha teaches and to follow his teaching. You also understand what the Buddha really wants, which is to help all sentient beings, to further their happiness, to lessen their suffering and to establish them in the state of complete enlightenment. “This is what I promise to the Buddha. I will serve all sentient beings to the best of my abilities.”

Furthermore, you promise to confess all your negative deeds [sdig pa], and you swear not to repeat them again. Having offered yourself to the Buddha and become his servant, if you continue to commit negative deeds [sdig pa] such as the ten nonvirtuous actions [mi dge ba bcu], you become an embarrassment to the Buddha.

Therefore, “I confess and lay open all my previous misdeeds and promise to commit no further misdeeds in the future.” Commit yourself to being an utterly good person. Make this promise and commitment to the Buddha personally. A practitioner who really commits to the Buddha like this, changing his character in body, speech and mind, is truly a special person.

Offering your body to the Buddha and becoming his subject, will grant you supreme protection [bsrung ba mams kyi mchog]. This idea of offering one’s body to the Buddha inspires fear or discomfort in many people. It is not easy. When you offer your body to the Buddha, you offer your mind and your speech as well. This is a very meritorious training for Mahāyāna practitioners, who should actually dedicate their body, speech and mind repeatedly to the service of all sentient beings as an offering to the Buddha.

Some beginning practitioners may find it difficult to give even ordinary items away much less consider offering their body, speech and mind. Challenged beginners should start by giving away something that lacks value or is of little value, and then gradually build the habit of giving.

In the tantric tradition, a practitioner serves buddhas and beings equally, since all are endowed with the buddha nature. The buddha nature of a completely enlightened buddha and the buddha nature of a tiny insect is in no way different. Serving the Buddha and all sentient beings in the same manner is based not on compassion [snying rje] but on knowledge [shes rab] and pure perception [dag snang]. This tantric attitude differs from the service attitude of the bodhisattvas, who serve sentient beings from compassion but not necessarily with pure perception.

The tantric view considers that all beings are primordially buddhas. Engrossed in negativity [sdig pa] and obscurations [sgrub pa], they have not yet realized their essence, the buddha nature. These negativities and obscurations do not, however, truly exist, but are mere delusions. Tantric practitioners thus perceive all sentient beings as buddhas and train in pure perception and devotion to all buddha-like beings. Such an attitude must first be understood in theory [go ba], then experienced [myong ba], and finally realized [rtogs pa]. This is the view of ultimate bodhicitta, not of relative bodhicitta. Offering of one’s body to serve the buddhas and all beings is a characteristic of relative bodhicitta.

Text sections 94-96 / stanza 10:

In ancient India offering water for guests to wash hands and feet was considered a courtesy. To purify the stains [dri ma] and obscurations [sgrib pa] of their body, speech and mind, practitioners may extend this courtesy to the buddhas and bodhisattvas, offering a bathing ritual [khrus].

Visualize one or many bathing pavilions in the sky in front of you. Imagine that they are filled with sweet fragrances of sandalwood, camphor and so on. The foundations of the pavilions are composed of crystals in five colors, arranged like a great mosaic. These floors are unstained, even and perfectly flat [bstar legs pa].

Four pillars stand in the four directions of each bathing pavilion and each pavilion has a waist high wall to hold the water. Holes in the floor of the pavilions allow the water to drain, but at this point in the visualization they are stopped with plugs.

In the center of each pavilion is a platform. On top of it short pillars support a roof to shade the bathing buddhas from the sun. The roof is decorated with a wish-fulfilling jewel as the crowning pinnacle. Visualize various thrones and seats of precious materials around the sides of the pavilions. Then invite the Buddha, the perfectly enlightened one, and his entourage of bodhisattvas to enter.

Text sections 97-98 / stanza 11:

The Buddha is the Tathāgata, the ‘one gone to (the natural state) as it is’ [de bzhin gshegs pa]. As he himself has realized without any error the ‘the natural state as it is’ [chos nyid de bzhin nyid], he is able to help others realize the same view. ‘Gone’ [gshegs pa] connotes ‘having arrived at’. A buddha is someone who has reached the highest level of bliss, nirvāṇa, liberation, enlightenment or buddhahood. ‘Gone’ also connotes ‘realization’ [rtogs pa] and ‘knowledge’ [mkhyen pa].

After the Buddha and the bodhisattvas have arrived at the pavillions, they remove their monk robes, hang them over the railings, and are clothed in transparent white bathing garments. Visualize many offering goddesses pouring water from precious vases over the bodies of the buddhas and bodhisattvas. While the offering goddesses bathe the Buddha and the bodhisattvas, other offering goddesses entertain them. Some of the goddesses offer melodious songs of praise like the ‘Short Praise of the Ten Deeds of the Buddha’, which begins:

At the time when the supreme one among humans was born,
He took seven steps on this great earth
And exclaimed, “In this world I am the supreme one.”
I pay respect to you, who were at this time already wise.

Some offering goddesses offer beautiful dances while others play musical instruments.

Text section 99:

After the Buddha and the bodhisattvas have bathed, the plugs are removed from the bathing pavilions, and a fine rain of divine bath water showers down on oneself and all sentient beings, purifying all negative deeds and obscurations. At the same time the evil and harmful intentions of the deities of the area [yul lha], the local deities [gzhi bdag], demons, ogres and ogresses, disease-causing demons [nad bdag] and so forth are pacified. All diseases of humans and animals are eradicated, and the precious bodhicitta is born in everyone’s mind. These are the benefits of offering bathing to the Buddha and the bodhisattvas.

Having been bathed, the bodies of the buddhas and bodhisattvas must be dried with well-scented towels, made from the most precious and priceless materials such as the cloth of the gods [lha’i gos] or fine Benares silk [ras kā śi ka].

Next, visualize that the towels transform into red light and dissolve into the space between the eyebrows of yourself and all sentient beings, granting blessings and accomplishments. Imagine that you and all beings have attained all the qualities and wisdom of these enlightened beings. That is the benefit of drying the bodies of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas.

Following this, you present the Buddha and the bodhisattvas with new sets of robes. To all the nirmāṇakāya manifestations, such as the Buddha, you offer blue, red and yellow ordination garments, the three-fold robes [chos gos rnam gsum; skr. tri-civara] of monks and nuns. Of these, the first is the monk’s ‘lower robe’ [mthang gos; skr. antarvāsa] that is stitched from many patches. The second is the yellow cloak stitched from only a few patches known as the ‘upper robe’ [chos gos / bla gos, skr. uttarāsāṅga]. This cloak is worn only when practicing the dharma. Fully ordained monks wear this on top of their shawls [gzan]. The third is the yellow cloak stitched from one hundred and twenty-five patches and is called the ‘patched robe’ [snam byar; skr. saṃghāṭi]. It is worn only by fully ordained monks. This particular cloak is worn on top of the former cloak only on special occasions.

A fully ordained monk must always have these three-fold robes with him, even if he does not wear them all. At least every morning before dawn when he awakes, and every evening before he goes to bed, he must put all three of them on his body and wear them for a few minutes. If he fails to do this, he has committed an infraction of his precepts.

When the monks celebrate the bi-monthly poṣadha ceremony [gso sbyon gi cho ga], they need to wear the two cloaks. Poṣadha [gso sbyong] literally means ‘repairing and purifying’ and is the principal ceremony for ordained Buddhist monks and nuns to purify any breakage of precepts and restore their purity of ordination. During this ceremony they recite the Prātimokṣa-sūtra, thus re-establishing their virtue [dge ba gso] and purifying their misdeeds [sdig pa sbyong]. At the beginning [sbyor ba] of the ceremony they wear the cloak stitched from many patches [chos gos]. During the main part [dgos gzhi], when the Prātimokṣa-sūtra is recited, they must wear the cloak stitched from a few patches [rnam sbyar].

Monks must dress properly. When lay people see a well-dressed and well-behaved monk, they feel inspired and devoted to the three jewels and thus gain merit. A well-dressed and well-behaved monk is always an encouragement and reminder for the laity to practice virtue. Conversely, a monk who dresses in showy manner and behaves strangely causes the laity to develop doubts about the saṃgha, and thus becomes a cause for people to accumulate demerit.

Buddha said that if someone pretends to be a ordained monk, wears the robes of an ordained monk, lives in a monastery and eats monastery food without having received any of the monks’ vows, he commits a greater crime than if he had committed the ten non-virtuous actions for ten years. Therefore, only someone who has taken monk’s precepts is allowed to use the thirteen possessions of (ordained) livelhood.

Monks at the time of the Buddha were all mendicants. Only during the rainy season did they stay in the gardens and monasteries that sponsors had donated for this purpose. Their personal property was reduced to the ‘six basic possessions’ [yo byad drug]: 1-3) the three-fold monk’s robes [chos gos mam gsum], 4) the begging bowl [lhung bzed], 5) a water filter [chu tshags] and 6) a mat (sitting blanket) [gding ba]. Monks at that time lived solely by begging alms and accumulated no personal property.

The vinaya, the code of precepts, allows monks to have three types of possessions [yo byad gsum]: 1) possessions necessary for livelihood [’tsho ba’i yo byad], 2) monastic possessions [’khor ba’i yo byad], and 3) additional possessions [lhag pa’i yo byad].

1) The ‘possessions necessary for livelihood’ refer to the thirteen garments monks need to maintain their bodies as well as to the abovementioned six basic possessions [yo byad drug]. According the vinaya the ‘thirteen possessions necessary for livelihood’ [’tsho ba’i yo byad bcu gsum] include: 1) the yellow cloak stitched from many sections called the ‘patched robe’ [mam sbyar], 2) the yellow cloak stitched from a few sections known as the ‘upper robe’ [bla gos], 3) the monk’s shirt stitched from many sections known as the ‘lower robe’ [mthang gos], 4) the under skirt [sham thabs], which is worn under the lower robes 5) the night under skirt [sham thabs kyi gzan], worn on top of the monk’s petticoat, 6) the sweat cloth [rngul gzan], 7) the night sweat cloth [rngul gzan gyi gzan], 8) the bathing towel [gdon phis], 9) gauze fro wounds [rnag gzan], 10) the flannel to relieve skin rash [g.yan dgb], 11) the sheet to collect hair when shaving [skra gzed], 12) the mat (sitting blanket) [gding ba], and 13) the rainy season cloak [dbyar gyi gos ras chen]. The monks regard these possessions for livelihood as personal property.63

In addition, monks can own a few minor possessions to sustain their livelihood [’tsho ba’i yo byad phren tshogs] such as: a hat [zhva], a belt [sko rags], shoes [lham] and shoelaces [lham sgrog], a knee cover used by meditators [spong ba bsam gtan pa’i pus ’khyud], a bag for their robes, and a box in which to store possessions [gtur ba ste chos gos kyi shubs sam yo byad mams ’jug snod].

2) ‘Monastic possessions’ are the personal property of monks as well as the communal property of the samgha. The personal property of monks [sger gi ’khor] and the communal property of the samgha [dge ’dun spyi’i ’khor] are considered extremely sensitive and perilous.64

63 For further details see Buddhist Ethics, pages 137-139.
64 This property is called ‘black property’ [’khor nag po] because the consequences of using it without authorization or misusing it are so dire. In particular, monastic property should never be used by the laity.

3) The ‘additional possessions’ are items such as shrine objects and so on that are needed only occasionally. The monks must treat all these additional possessions as communal property [thun mong gi yin pa / spyi’i ’khor]. Additional possessions also include items given to the monks by sponsors which the monks may not need. The monks must treat all such additional possessions as though they actually belonged to someone else [gzhan gi yin pa].

One next offers the saṃbhogakāya manifestations, the bodhisattvas, the five silk garments [dar gyi chos gos lnga]: 1) the dance jacket [gar gyi phu dung] that has the power to ignite the bliss of meditation in the body; 2) the top [stod g.yogs] with golden design [gser gyi ngang ris can]; 3) the multi-colored leggings [tshi gu’i smad dkris]; 4) the tiara made of various kinds of silk [dar sa tshogs kyi cod pan]; and 5) ribbons [zi ldir]. A silk shawl [dpyang bgrang] can be substituted for the dance jacket.

The benefit of offering clothing to the Buddha and bodhisattvas is that one is thus endowed with a sense of shame in regard to oneself [rang ngo la ngo tsha] and a sense of embarrassment in front of others [gzhan ngo la khrel yod pa]. When a beginning bodhisattva has received the bodhisattva precepts from his teacher, he will develop a sense of personal shame that will prevent him from breaking his precepts. Remaining in contact with his teacher, the beginning bodhisattva will also develop a sense of embarrassment and scruples with regard to his behavior that will prevent him from breaking his precepts.

One next offers the eight precious ornaments [rin po che’i rgyan brgyad]: 1) the jewel crown [dbu rgyan] ornamented with clusters of beryl [skr. vaidurya] and other (stones); 2) the earrings [snyan rgyan]; 3) the throat ornament [mgul rgyan]; 4) the long necklace [do shal]; 5) the short necklace [se mo do]; 6) the bracelets [phyag gdub]; 7) the anklets [zhabs gdub]; and 8) the belt [ske rag].

The five silk garments and the eight precious ornaments combined are called ‘the thirteen saṃbhogakāya ornaments’ [longs spyod rdzogs pa’i rgyan bcu gsum]. Among the infinite bodhisattvas, the most important ones are the eight great bodhisattvas or the ‘eight great close sons’ [nye ba’i sras chen brgyad]: Mañjuśrī [’jam dbyangs], Vajrapāṇī [phyag na rdo rje], Avalokiteśvara [spyan ras gzigs dbang phyug], Kṣitigarbha [sa yi snying po], Sarvanīvaraṇaviśkambhi [sgrīb pa thams cad rnam par sel ba], Ākāśagarbha [nam mkha’i snying po], Maitreya [byams pa] and Samantabhadra [kun tu bzang po]. The benefit of offering ornaments to the bodhisattvas is the attainment of the major marks and minor signs for oneself and all other sentient beings.

As described above you may offer bathing, drying and clothing to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas of the three times or just to Buddha Śākyamuni, the eight great bodhisattvas and the sixteen elders.

Text section 105:
The term offerings of enjoyments [nyer mchod] refers to things that one normally requires for rituals and daily use, such as incense, butter lamps and the like. Such offerings are to be made on a vast scale, conventionally described in Buddhist literature in accordance with the vastness of Indian cosmology.

The Abhidharma-koṣa-kārikā describes this cosmology in the following way. One single world system consists of the central mountain, Mount Sumeru, four main continents and eight subcontinents, as well as the sun and the moon. Above Mount Sumeru begin the god realms, which extend up to the most subtle realms of the god Brahmā. Of the four main continents, ours is Jambudvīpa, the ‘Rose Apple Continent’, located to the south of Mount Sumeru.

The sum of ‘a thousand single world systems’ is called ‘the first order of a thousand world systems’ [stong dang po / stong dang po'i jig rten gyi kham] or ‘the lesser order of a thousand world systems’ [stong chung ngu'i jig rten gyi kham], which means 1.000 to the power of one.

One thousand ‘lesser order of a thousand world systems’ constitute ‘the middle order of a thousand world systems’ [stong bar ma'i jig rten gyi kham] or ‘the second order of a thousand world systems’ [stong gnyis pa; skr. dvi-sāhasra / stong gnyis pa'i jig rten gyi kham], which means a thousand to the power of two or one million separate world systems.

One thousand ‘middle order of a thousand world systems’ make ‘the large order of a thousand world systems’ [stong chen po'i jig rten gyi kham] or ‘the third order of a thousand world systems’ [stong gsum pa; tri-sāhasra], also called ‘the third order, the larger order of one thousand world systems’ [stong gsum gyi stong chen po'i jig rten gyi kham; skr. tri-sāhasra-mahāsāhasra loka-dhātuḥ], which means a thousand to the power of three or one billion separate word systems—a trichiliocosm.65

Our cosmos of a ‘third order of a thousand world systems’ is called the ‘world system of endurance’ [mi mjad 'jig rten gyi kham, skr. sahalokadhātu] and is the sphere of influence and activities of one nirmāṇakāya buddha, in our case, Buddha Śākyamuni. Based on another explanation, the same term can also be translated as ‘the fearless world system’. ‘Fearless’ [mi skrags pa'am zhed snang med pa] refers to the fact that in this cosmos of the ‘third order of a thousand world systems’, sentient beings are not afraid of affictions [nyon mongs par mi skrab pa] as they do not fear the consequences of their actions. According to yet another explanation, the same term can be translated as the ‘inseparable world system’, since in this world sentient beings cannot separate from their karma and afflictions [jig rten gyi kham 'di na sems can mams kyi rgyud la las dang nyon mongs pa dbyed ba mjad du mi nus pa].
Concerning the ‘offering of anointing’ [byug pa ‘bul ba], you visualize offering goddesses anointing the Buddha and the bodhisattvas with sweetly scented water. For further details see Buddhist Cosmology, Illuminator, Myriad Worlds; and Prince Jiý Gim’s Textbook.

from precious vessels made of jewels and precious materials such as conch shell and the like. They anoint the bodies of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas so that the thirty major marks and the eighty minor signs of the buddhas shine like refined gold. They anoint and rub them with medicinal substances so that their bodies glow. Imagine that the fragrance of these substances permeates the whole the entirety of the ‘third order of a thousand world systems’.

Next are offered beautiful flowers from the realms of the gods, nāgas and humans. These include the māndāravā flower, said to be enchanting and endowed with the most marvelous fragrance. One imagines tossing into the sky flowers which turn into beautiful houses, canopies, flags, banners, streamers, maṇḍalas and so forth. Imagine that a rain of flowers descends and is carried by the wind to the buddhas of the ten directions. Visualize beautiful garlands of sweet-smelling flowers. Offer all this to the Buddha and the bodhisattvas, imagining that heaps of flowers of the seven factors of enlightenment [byang chub kyi yan lag bdun] bloom in the minds of yourself and all sentient beings. These seven factors of enlightenment are:

1. The enlightened factor of correct mindfulness [dran pa yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

2. The enlightened factor of correct investigation of phenomena [chos rab du mam par ‘byed pa yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

3. The enlightened factor of correct effort [brtson ‘grus yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

4. The enlightened factor of correct joy [dga’ ba yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

5. The enlightened factor of correct pliancy [shin tu sbyangs pa yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

6. The enlightened factor of correct concentration [ting nge ’dzin yan dag byang chub kyi yan lag].
7. The enlightened factor of correct equanimity [btang snyoms yang dag byang chub kyi yan lag].

Text section 108 / stanza 16:

The flower offering is followed by the offering of incense and fragrant substances such as white and red sandalwood and others, either natural or manufactured. Imagine that this wonderful scent pervades everywhere and is carried by the winds to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas in the ten directions. Visualize yourself and all sentient beings endowed with the scent of discipline.

Monks who have truly kept their vows throughout their lives, beginning from the time when they entered into the monastery as children, actually carry a special scent that pervades their surroundings. The Tibetans call this the ‘odor of (monastic) discipline’ [tshul khrims kyi dri ma] and it results from great purity. A monk with this special odor has no thoughts of desire, even in dreams, since his mind is utterly free from desire [chags sems].

Text section 109 / stanza 16:

Next is offered food that has one hundred flavors which can be experienced simultaneously. You offer the three white substances [dkar gsum]: yogurt [zho], milk [’o ma] and butter [mar], as well as the three sweet substances [mngar gsum]: white rock sugar [shel ka ra], brown sugar [bu ram] and honey [sbrang rtsi]. The divine or royal delicacies [lha bshod] are offering tormas, which are like cakes. In making this offering, imagine that you and all beings have attained the nourishment of samādhi.

Text sections 110-112 / stanza 17

Next, imagine the whole world to be covered with heaps of lotuses arranged in rows that hold lamps of various precious substances. Imagine that each lamp, as large as the entirety of the ‘third order of a thousand world systems’, is filled with a vast ocean of butter and holds a wick the size of Mount Sumeru. At the end make the aspiration that through this lamp offering the ignorance of all beings be dispelled and omniscient wisdom perception illuminate the minds of all.

Following this is the offering of flowers. Imagine the world as a pure and level floor, anointed with perfumes and scattered over with infinite beautiful flowers. Make the aspiration that all beings may be firm in their bodhicitta resolve.

Immense and beautiful palaces with hundreds of levels, inhabited by offering goddesses who present all kinds of offerings to the buddhas and bodhisattvas are offered next. Imagine the palaces as perfect mansions. Outside, in beautiful gardens, lovely water birds float on the ponds. The interior rooms contain everything one could need or desire such as the seven secondary precious things [nye ba’i rin po che sna bdun]: 1) a sword [ral khri], 2) a hide [pags la], 3) a noble pavilion [khang bzang], 4) garments [gos], 5) a garden [tshal], 6) a seat [mal sa], and 7) shoes [lham]. All these palaces are illuminated by precious lamps, whose light reaches into the infinity of space. Imagine all of space to be filled with palaces, palaces that float within space, illuminating everything. Make the aspiration that all sentient beings may reach the level of liberation.

66 The ‘third order of a thousand world systems’ [stong gsum] means 1.000 to the power of three, which equals one billion single world systems.

Offer beautiful parasols,67 ornamented with pearls, their golden handles held by offering goddesses, horses and elephants, who carry them aloft. Imagine that all beings are relieved of the suffering of the three lower realms. The magical horse [rta cang shes], also called the ‘precious and supreme horse’ [rta mchog rin po che], has magical qualities. It can speak to humans; it can run around the world in one day, and so forth.

Text sections 117-119:

The aforementioned ‘twelve mentally created offerings’ [yid sprul gyi mchod pa’i rnam grangs bcu gnyis po] are subdivided into two sections, the offering of bathing and the offering of enjoyments. They are listed in stanzas ten through nineteen:

First, the offering of bathing:

1. The offering of bathing [sku khrus gsol ba]
2. The offering of drying [sku phyis]
3. The offering of garments [nam bza’ ‘bul ba]
4. The offering of ornaments [rgyan ‘bul ba]

Second, the offering of enjoyments:

5. The offering of anointing with perfumes [dri mchog byug pa’i mchod pa]
6. The offering of flowers [me tog gi mchod pa]
7. The offering of incense [bdug spos kyi mchod pa]
8. The offering of food [zhal zas kyi mchod pa]
9. The offering of lamps [snang gsal gyi mchod pa]
10. The offering of level floors [sa gzhi star ba’i mchod pa]
11. The offering of noble and divine palaces [gzhal med khang bzang gi mchod pa]
12. The offering of parasols [gdugs kyi mchod pa]
If you cannot visualize offerings as vast as the entirety of the ‘third order of a thousand world systems’, simply visualize as much as you can think of. Śāntideva was a yogin of simplicity who lacked physically assembled offerings. He taught how to gather the accumulation of merit without any hardship or material wealth. Therefore, this method is called the ‘offering of the bodhisattvas skillful in means’.

Do not belittle these different kinds of offerings. Visualize them in brief moments again and again. You need not visualize them constantly as when you meditate on a deity. These repeated offerings will generate great benefit. Through them a practitioner can achieve all qualities, purify obscurations, gather the accumulations, remember what he has studied, give birth to bodhicitta in his mind and so on. As you only imagine these offerings, other people cannot see them; thus, these imagined offerings can never be misused to serve arrogance and pretentiousness. Material offerings allow inferior people to flaunt their wealth and serve their own arrogance. Moreover, imagined offerings are never acquired through wrong livelihood or negative deeds, as material offerings sometimes are.

If you have the means and the time, set up the physical offerings on your shrine. However, if you are poor like Śāntideva, then offer according to your means. Do not neglect to make daily physical offerings on your shrine due to laziness.

What follows are offerings made through the power of aspirations. Make the aspiration that the entirety of the ‘third order of a thousand world systems’ may be filled with the pleasant and melodious sounds of musical instruments. These melodious sounds that you offer should be irresistibly beautiful.

One of the foremost students of Buddha Śākyamuni was the stern arhat, Mahākāśyapa [ˈod srung chen po]. Once he heard a spirit called Druma-kimnara [mi’am ci’i sdong po] playing the lute [sgra snyan / pi vang]. This spirit had the power to assume a human form. The sound of the spirit’s lute was so unbearably beautiful that Mahākāśyapa could not resist dancing, although he had attained arhatship.69 Equally beautiful is the sound of the tambura of the gandharva king Supriya [dri za’i rgyal po rab dga’].70

The sounds that you offer to the buddhas and bodhisattvas should be so beautiful that upon hearing them, the suffering of sentient beings is soothed. Beautiful music has the power to uplift your spirit when you are depressed. Music can make you inspired and happy. Likewise, you can offer any of the five sense pleasures as an aspiration so that they become offerings to the buddhas, serving to alleviate the suffering of beings.

“May these kinds of ‘cloud banks of offerings’ [mchod pa’i sprin phung], meaning multitudes of offerings, remain each individually distinct in front of the buddhas” [sangs rgyas rnam kyi sku mdun la so sor gnas par gyur cig]. Imagine beautiful offering goddesses playing various instruments and presenting these offerings to the buddhas and bodhisattvas. This is the first offering (made) through the power of aspirations. Make the aspiration that these musical sounds ascend to each of the buddhas continuously for aeons and aeons.

Make the aspiration that a continuous rain of gems [rin po che’i char] and flowers [me tog gi char] as well as a rain of offering substances [mchod rdzas kyi char] such as garments [gos], ornaments [rgyan], grains [bru], medicinal substances [sman] and so forth may descend on all dharma books, stūpas and images of the Buddha. That is the second offering made through the power of aspiration.

You may also pray to take rebirth as a beautiful sandalwood tree in front of your root guru, with the beautiful scent of this tree pervading the whole world. Pray also that beautiful birds settle on this tree and delight your root guru with melodious songs. All aspirations made with a sincere heart and good motivation will eventually come true. The Buddha is shown through three types of representations, the representations of his body, of his speech and of his mind. Statues are considered representations of Buddha’s body [sku rten]; Buddhist scriptures are considered representations of his speech [gsung rten]; and stūpas are considered representations of his mind [thugs rten]. Among these, the representations of Buddha’s mind are the earliest [ches lnga ba]. Buddha’s father, King Śuddhodana [zas gtsang sras], built a stūpa to commemorate his son’s birth in Lumbini, close to Kapilavastu [ser skya, skr. kapila]. This was the very first representation of the Buddha.

The first drawing [ri mo la ches sna ba] of a Buddhist symbol was the ‘wheel of life’ [srid pa’i ’khor lo; skr. bhacakrā], a symbolic representation of the twelve links of interdependent origination [rten ’brel yan lag bcu gnyis] and the six classes of beings [’gro ba rigs drug].

The first painting of Buddha’s body [sku gzugs la ches snga ba] is known as ‘the painting taken from the water’ [bris sku chu lon ma]. When the artists looked at the Buddha, they were filled with such blissful contentment that they were unable to reproduce Buddha’s magnificence. Therefore, the Buddha sat beside a pool, and a picture was painted from his reflection. Thus, it is called ‘the painting taken from the water’. The first symbolic drawing and the first painting are said to have been made during the reigns of two kings, King Bimbisāra [gzugs can snying po] of Rājagṛha [rgyal po'i khab] and King Utrāyaṇa of Roruka [sgra sgrog]. Although these two kings lived far apart and had never met one another, they had a natural affinity for each other. It was their custom to exchange letters and gifts. Once King Utrāyaṇa sent King Bimbisāra a priceless jeweled coat of armor [nor bu'i khrab rin thang gzhal du med pa]. King Bimbisāra felt compelled to return the favor with an equally valuable present [skyes len].

The king’s first minister, Varṣākāra [dbyar tshul], recommended having a picture of Buddha Śākyamuni painted and sent as a return gift. When the king requested permission from the Buddha, the Buddha agreed, advising King Bimbisāra that this picture should contain a representation of the Buddha and below it the wheel of life with a few lines of teachings. According to the Buddha’s advice, the symbolic drawing of the wheel of life and the ‘painting taken from the water’ were both arranged on a single canvas and sent as a present to King Utrāyaṇa.

When he saw this picture, King Utrāyaṇa asked about the figure in the painting, the symbolic drawing, and the written piece of advice. From this he gained faith in the Buddha. Contemplating on the twelve links of interdependent origination, he clearly realized the truth [bden pa mthong ba], that is to say he understood the nature of the four noble truths. King Utrāyaṇa then invited the noble Kātyāyana and an entourage of five hundred monks to his kingdom and had five hundred temples built.71 According to Tibetan tradition, the first representations of Buddha’s speech were two Buddhist scriptures, the Prajñāpāramitā and the Ārya-dhvaja-agrakeyūra-nāmadhāraṇī.

The Prajñāpāramitā [sher phyin], a teaching of the second promulgation,72 was said to have been written with liquid blue beryl in a golden book by Śakra [brgya byin], the king of the gods. The Ārya-dhvaja-agrakeyūra-nāma-dhāraṇī [’phags pa rgyal mtshan gyi rtse mo’i dpung rgyan ces bya ba’i gzugs]73 was transcribed and placed in the top of a victory banner [rgyal mtshan].

Other accounts report that the first canvas painting was made at the request of the Singalese princess Muktālātā [mu tiṅ ’khris shing].74 The Buddha let rays from his body shine on a cloth, and an artist outlined his form. This painting became known as ‘Taken from the Rays of the Muni’s Body’ [thub sku ‘od zer ma] and was sent to princess Muktālātā. As soon as she saw the painting, she entered into deep meditation, realized the truth, and achieved the state of a ‘stream-enterer’ [rgyun du zhugs pa].

The stories of the first relief statues [’bur sku] of the Buddha are as follows: Buddha’s great benefactor Anāṇṭhapāṇḍaka [mgon med sbyin] asked the Buddha for permission to make a statue since he felt that when the Buddha was not present during the monks’ mid-day meal, the assembly lacked splendor. Buddha agreed, and Anāntha-piṇḍaka commissioned many statues according to the specifications laid down by the Buddha himself.

Another account reports that when Buddha was visiting his mother for three months in the abode of the ‘thirty-three gods’,75 the king of Kāśi [gsal ldan] wished to erect a statue as a devotional object in the Buddha’s absence. The king requested Maudgalyāyana [maudgal gi bu] to help. Maudgalyāyana, through his magical powers, transported the craftsmen who were to work on the statue to the celestial realms, where they received direct instructions from the Buddha in person. On their return to Kāśi they erected a life-size sandalwood statue which looked like the Buddha’s body [tsandan giy ’dra sku]. It is said that when Buddha returned from his visit to the celestial realms, the statue took six steps forward to greet him. Later this statue was taken to China, where it has since been known as the ‘Sandalwood Lord of China’ [rgya nag tsandan jo bo].

The thirty-three gods [lha sum cu rtsa gsum; skr. trayastriṃśa-deva] reside on top of Mount Sumeru and belong to the ‘six classes of gods of the realm of desire’ [’dod lha ris drug / ’dod lha rigs drug], which are: 1) the four groups of the great guardian kings [rgyal chen rigs bzhi; skr. caturmahārāja-kāyikā], 2) the thirty-three gods [sum cu rtsa gsum; skr. trayastriṃśa], 3) the gods free from conflict [’thab bral; skr. yāma], 4) the joyful gods [dga’ ldan; skr. tuṣṭa], 5) the gods enjoying emanations [’phrul dga’; skr. nirmāṇarati] and 6) the gods with mastery over others’ emanations [gzhan ’phrul dbang byed; skr. paranirmita-vāsavattīnā].

It is also reported that when the time for the Buddha to enter into nirvāṇa was drawing near, he ordered statues of himself in order to preserve his teaching for future generations and to tame those who followed other beliefs and paths, the tīrtikas [mu stegs]. He summoned the gods Brahma [tshangs pa], Viṣṇu [khyab 'jub] and Śakra [brgya byin]. Brahma had a stūpa erected as a dharmakāya representation of Buddha. Viṣṇu took various jewels from the nāgas and built a saṃbhogakāya representation of the Buddha called ‘Great Glacial Ocean Vairocana’ [mam snang gangs chaṃtsho], measuring eighty thousand leagues,76 and placed the statue in the ocean. Śakra, the king of the gods, gathered precious substances from the god realms as well as from the human realm, and ordered the celestial artist, Viśvakarman [bi shva karma], to erect three nirmāṇakāya representations of the Buddha.

Following the description of Buddha’s nursemaid [ma maṅgag bzhin], Viśvakarman’s first and second statues portrayed Buddha at the ages of eight and twelve. The third statue depicted Buddha at twenty-five. Buddha himself blessed these statues. Śakra took the third statue to the celestial realms. The first two remained for some time in the realm of the gods, in Oḍḍīyāna, in the realms of the nāgas, and eventually at the vajrāseat [rdo rje gdan] in Bodhgayā.

During the reign of King Devapāla, the statue of the twelve-year-old Buddha was taken to China, and the statue of the eight-year-old Buddha was transported to Nepal. The thirty-three gods are: (1-8) the eight wealth gods [nor lha brgyad; skr. vāsudeva] such as (???) 1) [chu lha], 2) [brten pa], 3) [zla ba], 4) [’dzin byed], 5) [rlung], 6) [me], 7) [nam langs] and 8) [’od byed]; (9-19) the eleven wrathful ones [drag po bcu gcig; skr. rūdra] such as 1) [ma skyes], 2) [rkan gcig ‘phel], 3) [’jog po], 4) [drag po], 5) [bṛtson ‘grus ldan], 6) [’phrog byed], 7) [bde ’byung], 8) [mig gsum], 9) [gzhlan las rgyal ba], 10) [dbang ldan], 11) [sa gsum]; (20-31) the twelve suns [nyi ma bcu gnyis; skr. āditya] such as 1) [dbang po], 2) [byed pa po], 3) [lam pa], 4) [char ’bebs], 5) [bstd byed], 6) [sngon min], 7) [sngon ’phags], 8) [mi gzugs], 9) [khyab ’jug], 10) [’od can], 11) [chu bdag] and 12) [gshin rje]; and (32-33) the two sons of Aśvin [tha skar gyi bu gnyis] such as 1) [tha skar gyi lha] and 2) [gzhon nu’i lha].

76 A league [skr. yojana, tib. dpag tshad] is an old Indian measurement. See Myriad Worlds, page 266, endnote 7. Twenty-four fingers [sor mo nyi shu rtsa bzhí] make up one cubit [khru gang], the length of the forearm, measured from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger. Four cubits [khru bzhí] are one fathom [’dom gang], measured from the right tip to the left tip of the middle fingers of the out-stretched arms. Five hundred fathoms are one ear-shot or calling distance [rgyang grags] and eight ear-shots are one league [dpag tshad]. See Abhidharma-kosha, page 288.

In the seventh century A.D. the Tibetan king Songtsen Gampo (618-641),77 took a Chinese consort [rgya ba’] and a Nepalese consort [bal bza’]. The Nepalese consort brought with her the statue of the eight-year-old Buddha and had it placed in a spacially built temple called the ‘Rasa Trūl Nang Temple’ [ra sa ‘phrul snang gi gtsug lag khang]. This temple came to be known as the ‘Jo Khang’ [jo khang] of Lhasa, and the statue became renowned as the ‘Jowo Mikyö Dorje’ [jo bo mi bskyod rdo rje].

King Songtsen Gampo’s Chinese consort brought with her the statue of the Buddha at the age of twelve. She built the Ramoche temple [rva mo che’i gtsug lag khang] for this statue. Later, due to political turbulence in Tibet, the location of the statues was reversed, and at present ‘Jowo Mikyö Dorje’, the Buddha at the age of eight, can be visted at the Ramoche Temple, while the statue of Buddha at the age of twelve is in the Jo Khang. This statue is now known as Jowo Rinpoche or as Jowo Śākyamuni [jo bo shākyā mu ni]. All these statues are reputed to have been made during the Buddha’s lifetime.
Tibetan legend has it that King Songtsen Gampo emanated as the monk Akarmatīśī and brought from India to Tibet the famous statue of Avalokiteśvara [ṣpyan ras gzigs] called ‘Jowo Rangjön Ngaden’ [ṣpyan rtags byung lnga lhan], also known as ‘Jowo Rangjung Ngaden’ [ṣpyan rtags byung lnga lhan], as well as relics of ‘the seven generations of buddhas’ [sangs rgyas rabs byung].78

Countless representation of the Buddha in the form of statues, scriptures and stūpas were created after his nirvāṇa. King Aśoka alone was said to have built, with the magical help of yakṣas, one billion stūpas in different locations, all containing ‘relics grown from the bones’ [ṣku gdung ring bsrel] of the Buddha.79 These ‘grown relics’ look like tiny pearls and come in white, red, blue, green and yellow colors. They are believed to have appeared out of Buddha’s remains, and from the ashes of his funeral pyre. When these ‘grown relics’ in turn give rise to even more relics, they are called ‘multiplying relics’ [’phel gdung].80 Some sources report that King Aśoka erected ‘only’

77 According to the chapter on the ‘Three Revisions of the Tibetan Language’ in The Thirty Verses, “In the period from 750 A.D. to 1000 A.D., there is a variation in the dating of events among the most reliable of Tibetan sources by as much as 60 years.” According to Tibetan Empire, page 227, the dates for srong btsan sgam po are 618-641.

80 A stūpa must contain the five kinds of relics [ring bsrel mam lnga]: 1) the dharma relic [chos kyi ring bsrel], the dhāraṇīs written on the life-tree [srog shing] of the stūpa; 2) the dharmakāya relic [chos sku ring bsrel], the ‘small terracotta stūpas’ [tshva tshva] placed on top of the two maṇḍalas, which are the Vimalaśīśa [gsug gtor dri med] and Vimalaprabhā [’od zer dri med], both of which are absolutely indispensable for a stūpa; 3) the mustard seed-like relic [yungs ’bru lta bu’i ring bsrel], the white relic pearls of the Buddha [sangs rgyas kyi ring bsrel]; 4) the bone relics [ṣku gdung gi ring bsrel], the actual bones of the Buddha that were taken from his funeral pyre. This relic can be substituted with bones of great lamas; and 5) the clothes relics eighty-four thousand stūpas with the help of his magical army of yakṣas in the course of one day and one night.81 Among all these stūpas, the most famous is the group of eight stūpas built in India and Nepal.

The Kaṃsadeśa-vyākaraṇa [li’i yul lung bstan pa]82 recognizes two sets of eight great stūpas: a) the ‘eight great stūpas of the Tathāgata’ [de bzhin gshogs pa’i mchod rten bṛgyad] and b) the ‘eight great stūpas containing the relics that were divided into eight parts’ [ṣku gdung cha bṛgyad du bgos pa’i mchod rten chen po bṛgyad]. The eight stūpas of the Tathāgatha commemorate eight great events of the Buddha’s life and were constructed by his followers at the places where the events took place.
The eight great stūpas of the Buddha’s relics were built after Buddha’s relics were distributed among the eight claimants by a Brāhmaṇa called Droṇa [bram ze bre bo dang mnyam pa];83 1) the first part of the relics was taken by the the Mallas84 of Kuśinagara [sku gdung cha dang po rtsa can gyi gyed rnams]; 2) the second part of the relics was taken by the Mallas of Pāvā [cha gnyis pa sdig can gyi gyad rnams]; 3) the third part of the relics was taken by the royal class of Buluka [cha gsum pa rgyal rigs bu lu ka]; 4) the fourth part of the relics was taken by the King of the Koḍyas85 of Roruka86 [cha bzhi pa sgra srog kyi rgyal po kro taya]; 5) the fifth part of the relics was taken by the Brāhmaṇas of Viṣṇudvīpa87 [cha lnga pa khyab ’jug gling gi bram ze]; 6) the sixth part of the relics was taken by the Śākyas [cha drug pa śākya rnams] of Kapilavastu; 7) the seventh part of the relics was taken by the Licchavis [cha bdun pa li tsha bi rnams] of [sku bal ring bsrel], which refer to any of Buddha’s burned or unburned clothes. This relic can be substituted with clothes from great lamas who have passed away.

81 The Aśokāvadāna records that Aśoka collected relics from seven of the eight stūpas that were erected directly after Buddha’s parinirvāṇa and distributed the relics throughout India. Some sources report that Aśoka took the relics from beneath the stūpa in the city of Rājagaha [rgya po’i khab] that contained King Ajātaśatru’s share of Buddha’s relics. With these relics he is said to have erected eight-four thousand essence-relics-stūpas [ring bsrel snying po can gyi mchod rten brgyad khri bzhi stong] with the magical help of yakṣas [gnod sbyin] that he controlled by mantra power. See ston pa śākya thub pa’i rnams thar, pages 268-270.

84 Malla [gyad] can also mean ‘strongman’ or ‘hero’ [gyad; skr. Vikrama].
85 The Koḍya (Pali Koliya) is the name of the neighboring clan of the Śākyas. Obermiller translates the term with ‘the Krodhavas of Rāvaṇa’ [sgra srog kyi rgyal po kro taya]. See History of Buddhism, pages 60-61.
86 Some sources mention Rāmagrāma as the capital of the Koḍyas.
87 Obermiller translates the term with ‘the Brāhmaṇas of Viṣṇudvīpa’ [khyab ’jug gling gi bram ze]. See History of Buddhism, page 61.

Vaiśāli; and 8) the eighth part of the relics was taken by Ajātaśatru [ma skyes dgra]88 of Magadha.89

Each of the eight claimants erected a stūpa in their respective cities or countries: 1) the Mallas erected a stūpa in Kuśinagara and 2) in Pāvā [sdig can]; 3) the Bulakās erected a stūpa in the country of Calakalpā [rtog pa g.yo ba].90 4) the King of the Koḍyas erected a stūpa in Roruka,91 5) the fearless Bramins erected a stūpa in Viṣṇudvīpa, 6) the Śākyas erected a stūpa in Kapilavastu [ser skya’i gzhis], 7) the Licchavis erected a stūpa in Vaiśāli [yangs pa can], 8) and Ajātaśatru [ma skyes dgra] erected a stūpa in Veṇuvana ['od ma’i tshal], in the city of Rājagṛha [rgya po’i khab]. These stūpas became renowned as ‘the eight stūpas containing the relics’ [sku gdung gi mchod rten bgyad].

The Brāhmaṇa called Droṭa [bram ze bre bo dang mnyam pa] received the urn [gdung sgrom] in which the relics had first been deposited and the Brāhmaṇas of the city of Nyagrodha (Pippalavati) [nya gro dha’i bram ze] received the ashes of Buddha’s body [gdung sol]. Each erected a stūpa. Thus, altogether ten stūpas with Buddha’s relics were erected at that time.

In general, one can say that a stūpa symbolizes the dharmakāya, the mind of the Buddha. A stūpa is an object of worship [mchod pa’i rten], an object of commemoration [rjes su dran pa’i rten], as well as a reliquary [sku gdung mchod rten] of the Buddha or his important followers.

The names of the eight great stūpas of the Tathāgata vary slightly in the different scriptures. Following are the stories of these eight great stūpas:

(1) According to South Asian custom, a woman frequently returns to her natal home to give birth to her first child. Buddha’s mother, Māyādevī [sgyu ‘phrul lha mo], was in an advanced stage of pregnancy when she set out from Kapilavastu [ser skya, skr. kapila], the home of her husband, King Śuddhodana [zas gtsang sras], on her way to her mother’s house. Her mother, Devadaha, was to help with her delivery. However, Māyādevī had left too late and about 25 kilometers to the east of Kapilavastu, at the little village of Lumbinī, she gave birth to the Buddha under a Śāla tree.

The relics that the Licchavis brought to Vaśāśā have been excavated and are now on display in the Department of Archaeology and Museums in Patna, Bihar. Also the relics that the Śākyas brought to Kapilavastu have been excavated and can be seen in the Indian National Museum in Calcutta. As soon as the Buddha was born, he took seven steps in each of the four cardinal directions. A lotus sprang up to cushion each step. To commemorate the miraculous event of his birth, Buddha’s father, King Śuddhodana, sponsored the construction of a stūpa called ‘Stūpa of Heaped Lotuses’ [pad ma spungs pa’i mchod rten] in Lumbinī. This stūpa is also known as ‘Stūpa that Gives Rise to Auspiciousness’ [bkra shis ‘byung ba’i mchod rten] as well as ‘Stūpa of the Tathāgata’ [bde gshegs mchod rten]. This stūpa commemorating Buddha’s birth is considered to be the very first among all representations of the Buddha’s body, speech and mind.

(2) In the kingdom of Magadha, at Bodhgayā, on the sacred Vajrā Seat, [rdo rje gdan; skr. vajrāsana], Buddha attained enlightenment at the age of thirty-five. To commemorate this event, King Bimbisāra [gzugs can snying po] sponsored the construction of a stūpa called ‘Stūpa of Taming the Māras’ [bdud ‘dul mchod rten], which is also known as ‘Stūpa of Great Enlightenment’ [byang chub chen po’i mchod rten] or ‘Enlightenment Stūpa’ [byang chub mchod rten].

(3) At the Deer Park of Rṣipatana [drang srong lhung ba ri dags kyi nags tshal] in the district of Vārāṇasi, the Buddha set the wheel of dharma in motion, teaching the four noble truths to his first five disciples, the excellent group of five [ingga sde bzang po]. To commemorate this event, the Licchavis erected in Jetavana a stūpa variously called ‘Stūpa of Miracles’ [cho ‘phrul pa’i bden pa bzhi]: the truth of suffering, its origin, the path and the cessation of suffering.

(4) At Śrāvasti [mnyen yod] in Jetavana [rgyal byed kyi tshal], Buddha performed great miracles [cho ‘phrul chen po], defeating the six tīrtika teachers who expounded wrong views [log par smra ba’i mu stegs kyi ston pa drug]. To commemorate this event, the Licchavis erected in Jetavana a stūpa variously called ‘Stūpa of Miracles’ [cho ‘phrul pa’i bden pa bzhi]: the truth of suffering, its origin, the path and the cessation of suffering.

96 The excellent group of five [ingga sde bzang po] are: 1) Ajñāta-kaurṇḍinya [kun gzhi ko’u di na ya], 2) Āśvajit [rta thul], 3) Vāśpa [rlang pa], 4) Mahānāma [ming chen], and Bhadrika [bzang ldan].

97 Anāthapiṇḍada [mgon med zas sbyin] bought Jetavana, Jeta’s Grove, in Śrāvasti from Prince Jeta, who was a son of King Prasenajit [gsal rgyal], for an exorbitant price. Anāthapiṇḍada built individual cells, a meeting hall and a dining hall and so forth and presented the entire place to the Buddha and the Saṃgha as a monastery. Buddha declared Anāthapiṇḍada to be the foremost patron of the Saṃgha.

98 [mu stegs ston pa sde drug]: 1) (???) [rdzogs byed]; 2) Maskhari Gāśaliputra [phyug las kyi bu ma skā ri], [gnag las kyi bu]; 3) (???) [nam par smra ba’i bu mo’i bu kun nas rgyal ba], (???) [yang dag rgyal ba can]; 4) Ajita [skrī’i la ba can mi pham pa], [mi pham skra’i la ba can]; 5) Kukuda Kātyāyan [kātya yana’i nog can], [ka ta’i bu nog can]; 6) (???) (???) mchod rten], ‘Stūpa of Great Miracles’ [cho’phrul chen po’i mchod rten] or ‘Stūpa of Defeating the Tīrtikas’ [mu stegs pham byed mchod rten].

(5) After Buddha had spent three months in summer retreat [dbyar gnas mdzad pa] in the god realm of the thirty-three [trayastrīṃśa], where he had taught the dharma to his mother, Māyādevī [sgyu ‘phrul lha mo], he ended the restrictions [dgag dbye mzd pa] of the summer retreat in the morning and descended from the celestial realms to the human realm, arriving at Kāśi [gsal ldan] in Vaiśālī [yangs pa can]. To commemorate this event, the people of Kāśi constructed a stūpa called ‘Stūpa of Descending from the Gods’ [lha bab mchod rten / lha las babs pa’i mchod rten], also known as ‘Stūpa of the Thirty-Three Gods’ [sum cu rtsa gsum lha’i mchod rten].

(6) After Devadatta [lhas sbyin] had created a schism in the saṃgha at Rājagṛha [rgya po’i khab], Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana brought the saṃgha together again in reconciliation. To commemorate this event, the people from Maghadha, such as Prince Jeta [rgyal byed], erected in Veṇūvana [’od ma’i tshal]99 a stūpa called ‘Stūpa of Reconciliation’ [dbyen ‘dum mchod rten]. It is also known as ‘Stūpa of True Kindness’ [byams dngos mchod rten] or ‘Stūpa of Light Rays’ [’od zer can mchod rten].

(7) At Vaiśālī [yangs pa can] Buddha extended his lifespan for three months. To commemorate this event, the people of Vaiśālī100 constructed a stūpa called ‘Stūpa of Complete Victory’ [rnam rgyal mchod rten / rnam par rgyal ba’i mchod rten], also known as ‘Stūpa of Blessing’ [byin rlas mchod rten].

(8) At Kuśinagara [rtsa mchog gi grong] the Buddha entered into parinirvāṇa. To commemorate this event the Mallas of Kuśinagara [rtsa can gyi gyed] constructed a stūpa called ‘Parinirvāṇa Stūpa’ [myang ‘das mchod rten / mya ngan las ‘das pa’i mchod rten].

Replicating these eight great stūpas of the Tathāgata, which commemorate events of Buddha’s life, has become customary in the Tibetan Buddhist tradition. The stūpas can be built singly or as a set of eight. For example, H. H. Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche built the entire set at his monastery in Boudhanath, Nepal, and H. H. Penor Rinpoche has built two sets at his monastery at Bylakuppe, Mysore District, India.

Countless stūpas containing Buddha’s hair and nails were built while he was still alive. After Buddha passed away, In addition to the ‘eight great stūpas containing the relics that were divided into eight parts’ [sku gdung cha brgyad du bgos pa’i mchod rten chen po brgyad], his followers also built ‘stūpas which contained the remains of his burned clothes’ [ras tshig pa’i mchod rten], ‘stūpas which contained the remains of his unburned clothes’ [ras ma tshig pa’i mchod rten], and ‘stūpas which contained the charcoal’ [sol ba’i mchod rten] of his funeral pyre.

99 This grove in Rājagṛha was donated by King Bimbisāra [gzugs can snying po] to the Buddha and the Saṃgha.

100 Khenpo Kunpal states that the Mallas constructed this stūpa, while other sources mention the people of Vaiśālī.
Buddha’s four incisor teeth [tshems mche ba bzhi po] were placed in four stūpas which are no longer in the human realm. One stūpa was taken by Brahmā [tshangs pa], another by the the king of the nāgas below the city of Ruroka (Rāvana), a third by the king of Kalingka [ka ling ka], and the last by the gandharvas of the delightful city of Gândhâra [tshig ‘dzin yid ’ong].

Text section 126 / stanza 21:

The teachings of Dzogchen, the Great Perfection, trace their origin back to the three objects of the doctrine [bstan pa’i btsas gsum]. Wherever these three objects dwell, the teachings of the Great Perfection spread. These three objects are believed to travel through space, from one world system to another, remaining only in those universes where sentient beings have sufficient merit and karma to receive the Dzogchen teachings. The scriptures mention twelve particular places where twelve Dzogchen teachers (???) abide.

The three objects of the doctrine in which the Dzogchen teachings have their source are:

1) The representation of the body is a self-arisen statue of Buddha Vajradhara,102 made out of one hundred and one jewels, which presently abides in the realm of the thirty-three gods [skr. trayâstrîmśa-deva].

2) The representation of the speech is the Single Son of the Doctrine Tantra [bstan pa bu gcig gi rgyud], also known as the ‘Tantra of the Single Son of the Buddhás’ [sangs rgyas sras gcig gi rgyud], which can presently be found in the cave called ‘Wrathful Rśi Cave’ [rub tu khros pa drang srong phug] on the northern side of Mount Sumeru.

3) The representation of mind is a five-pronged vajra, one cubit tall, made out of one hundred and one jewels, which is said to be presently floating in the sky above Bodhgayā in India.

In the future, when the merit of sentient beings in our world system is exhausted, these three representations will fly to another world system. At that time, the Dzogchen teachings will no longer exist in this world. It is said that wherever these three representations reside, an inconceivable benefit for sentient beings will be spontaneously accomplished.

The Single Son of the Doctrine Tantra is considered capable of granting four types of liberation [grol ba bzhi idan]: liberation by sight [mthong grol], liberation by hearing [thos grol], liberation by touch [reg grol] and liberation by recall [dran grol]. ‘Liberation by sight’ means to see or read the tantra; ‘liberation by hearing’ means to hear someone recite it; ‘liberation by touch’ means to wear this tantra on one’s body; and ‘liberation by recall’ means to remember its qualities or to practice its teachings. Through seeing, hearing, touching or remembering this tantra, immeasurable negative karma will be gradually purified. These four liberations are a special feature of the Vajrayāna teachings.

102 Some texts mention a Vajrasattva statue.
196 Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations

Padmasambhava and Vimalamitra brought the Single Son of the Doctrine Tantra to Tibet, where it has been handed down from teacher to student within the oral tradition [bka’ ma] as well as within the tradition of revealed treasures [gter ma]. Discovered as a revealed treasure by the Dzogchen masters, Chetsün Senge Wangchug [ice btsun seng ge dbang phyug] and Pema Ledrel Tsal [padma las ‘brel rtsal], the great scholar Longchen Rabjam [klong chen rab ’byams] included this tantra in his Nyingthig Yabzhi [snying thig ya bzhis], a compendium of the Dzogchen teachings of Padmasambhava and Vimalamitra. Later, it was also discovered as a revealed treasure by the master Sangye Lingpa [sangs rgyas gling pa]. These different editions of the tantra may vary slightly in one or two words, but they are identical in meaning. The Nyingthig Yabzhi also contains a commentary on the Single Son of the Doctrine Tantra ascribed to the Indian Dzogchen master Śrī Śimha.

Text section 127:

‘Unexcelled offerings’ refers to the vast offerings created by Bodhisattva Samantabhadra through the power of his samādhi. From his heart center Samantabhadra emanated infinite multi-colored light rays in all directions. On the tip of each ray he manifested himself, and each emanation again radiated immeasurable rays of light. Thus, he reproduced himself immeasurable times on the tips of infinite light rays. On the tips of the final light rays emanating from the heart centers of infinite Samantabhadras, he manifested offering goddesses who presented to the three jewels countless masses of offerings such as the eight outer offerings [phyi’i mchod pa], which are: 1) clean, sweet-tasting drinking water [skr. argham, tib. mchod yon], 2) pure and refreshing bath water [skr. padam, tib. zhab bsil], 3) blooming flowers [skr. pushpe, tib. me tog], 4) fine smelling incense [skr. dhupe, tib. gdu gpos], 5) illuminating lamps [skr. aloke, tib. mar me], 6) fragrant perfume [skr. gandhe, tib. dri chab], 7) food [skr. naividyā, tib. zhal ras], and 8) music [skr. shapda, tib. rol mo].

Just as Bodhisattva Samantabhadra had filled the entirety of space with unexcelled offerings, the other tenth level bodhisattvas, such as Mañjuśrī and so forth, presented similar offerings to the Buddha. These offerings are called ‘unexcelled offerings’ or ‘unsurpassable offerings’ [bla na med pa’i mchod pa] because they cannot be duplicated in the human world. They excel or surpass anything that we know of. Even if we cannot actually emanate such inconceivable offerings, we should try to emulate [rjes mthun pa] these bodhisattvas so that we may slowly develop the same capacity.

Text section 130 / stanza 23:

Offer praises to the buddhas and bodhisattvas with poetic verses sung with a pleasant voice in various melodious tunes. Praise the thirty-two major marks and the eighty minor signs on the body of the Buddha. Praise the sixty aspects of his speech and the infinite qualities of his mind. Furthermore, praise the infinite qualities of the bodhisattvas, which differ from level to level. On the first level, the bodhisattva is endowed with one hundred and twelve qualities. On the second, with twelve thousand qualities and so forth. In that way, the bodhisattvas are endowed with an ocean of qualities.

Text section 131 / stanza 24:

The main reason to offer prostrations or to pay respect [phyag ’tshal ba] is to diminish pride [nga rgyal]. Paying respect to others clears the eye [mig gtsang ma gso gi yod], enabling one to see the qualities in others and to acknowledge them by paying respect. An arrogant person is like a blind person, like someone with a cataract [ling tog]. He cannot see the qualities in others at all. Offering prostrations or paying respect eliminates arrogance from the mind, removing the cataract of pride and self-aggrandizement.

Paying respect to the Buddha benefits the Buddha not at all, but is only for one’s own benefit.

Arrogance prevents qualities from developing in our own minds. As text section 186 of the first chapter states, “The water of qualities will not stay upon the ball of arrogance.” A mind filled with arrogance cannot hold the water of the sublime qualities of the dharma of statements and realization. A mind filled with pride and arrogance is not the proper vessel to receive teachings and practice the dharma. A mind filled with pride and arrogance is humbled through offering prostrations. The object of respect is the three jewels, 1) the buddhas of the three times and the ten directions, 2) the dharma of statements [lung gi chos] and the dharma of realization [rto gs pa’i chos], and 3) ‘the saṃgha, the supreme among gatherings’ [’dus pa rnam s kyi mchog dge ’dun].

The ‘dharma of statements’ [lung gi chos] refers to the tripiṭaka, the three baskets [sde snod gsum]. They are 1) the vinaya piṭaka, the basket of discipline [‘dul ba’i sde snod], 2) the sūtra piṭaka, the basket of discourses [mo sde’i sde snod], and 3) the abhidharma piṭaka, the basket of the doctrine [mgon pa’i sde snod]. The dharma of statements [lung gi chos] can also be divided into the twelve sections of scriptures [gsung rab yan lag bcu gnyis]. The wisdom of statements is the ‘wisdom that knows the statements of the three baskets’ [lung sde snod gsum ha go ba’i ye shes]. The wisdom of these three baskets is within the mind of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas who hold the ‘knowledge of having realized the entire teachings of the three baskets’ [lung sde snod gsum rtogs pa’i shes rab].

The ‘dharma of realization’ [rtogs pa’i chos] refers to the ‘three precious trainings’ [bslab pa rin po che nram pa gsum]: 1) the training in discipline [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa], 2) the training in samādhī [ting nge ‘dzin gyi bslab pa], and 3) the training in knowledge [shes rab kyi bslab pa]. The wisdom of realization is the ‘wisdom arising from the practice of the three trainings’ [rtogs pa bslab pa gsum nyams len byed pa’i ye shes]. All the buddhas and bodhisattvas have trained in discipline, samādhī and held knowledge in their minds.

In short, one can say that the dharma of statements [lung] refers to the three baskets [sde snod gsum], while the dharma of realization [rtogs pa] refers to the three precious trainings [bslab pa rin po che gsum].

What is meant by the phrase ‘the saṃgha, the supreme among gatherings’? The minds of the saṃgha members and the wisdom of egolessness that they have realized [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes] are inseparable. Generally, all compounded things [‘dus byas] will eventually be dispersed. But the truth of the path [lam bden], the realization of egolessness, and the mind of the person who has realized it can never be separated. The Sanskrit word ‘saṃgha’ does not refer to a supreme group of people, but to the inseparability of the realization of egolessness and the mind of the person who has realized it. All ordinary gatherings eventually fall apart, split or disperse, and are therefore not considered ‘supreme gatherings’. But the realization of egolessness and the mind of the person who has realized it will never fall apart and this, therefore, is known as ‘supreme among gatherings’. This is also a definition of the ‘noble saṃgha’ [‘phags pa’i dge ‘dun].

The ‘supreme among gatherings’ [tshogs rnas kyi mchog] means those who have reached the wisdom of the path of seeing [mthong lam gyi ye shes thob pa], the realizaion of egolessness, and are inseparable from it [de nyid bral ba med pa]. The supreme among gatherings is the gathering or unity of the person [gang zag] and the knowledge that realizes egolessness [bdag med rtogs pa shes rab].
The Hinayāna saṃgha consists of the śrāvakas [nyan thos], the two kinds of pratyekabuddhas [rang sans rgyas rigs gnyis].103 The Mahāyāna saṃgha refers to the bodhisattvas traversing the stages from the path of accumulation [tshogs lam] all the way to the tenth bhumi.

All those practitioners who have not realized egolessness but who abide by one of the seven sets of individual liberation [so thar rigs bdun] belong to the ordinary saṃgha or the ‘saṃgha of ordinary beings’ [so so skye bo’i dge ‘dun].104

When you offer prostrations, imagine that your body multiplies as many times as there are atoms in the countless buddha fields. Offer prostrations simultaneously with all these bodies. That is what the phrase ‘with bodies as numerous as all the atoms in the buddha fields’ means.

103 The pratyekabuddha who lives alone like a rhinoceros [bse ru lta bu’i rang sans rgyas] and the pratyekabuddha who lives among people [tshogs na spyod pa’i rang sans rgyas].
104 For a detailed discussion regarding the distinctions between the saṃgha of ordinary beings and the noble saṃgha see chapter one, text sections 222-223.

You may offer a full prostration [brkyangs phyag], throwing your entire body completely on the ground [lus thams cad sa la phab pa’i phyag]. Or you may offer a fivepoint prostration [yan lag lnga sa la phab pa’i phyag] by touching five points of your body [lus kyi mal lnga] to the ground. These five are your two knees [pus mo’i lha nga gnyis], the palms of both hands [lag mthil gnyis] and your forehead [dpral ba]. This prostration is also called a ‘half prostration’ or ‘bending prostration’ [bskums phyag]. The full prostration and the half prostration are both ‘physical prostrations’ [lus kyi phyag]. You may also imagine offering prostrations. That is called a ‘mental prostration’ [yid kyi phyag]. In any case, while you offer prostrations, in your mind generate devotion to the three jewels by recollecting their qualities, and with your voice recite the appropriate lines from the scriptures. In this way, the act of prostration purifies the obscurations of body, speech and mind.

The term ‘offering prostrations’ [phyag ‘tshal ba] can be explained in two ways, as ‘getting closer to the qualities of the object to which one offers prostrations’ [yul nye bo gso gi yod red] and as ‘meeting the qualities of the object to which one prostrates’ [rang gi sms yul gyi yon tan la thug gi yod red].

Text sections 132 / stanza 25:

The root text mentions the basis of bodhicitta [byang chub sms kyi gzhis]. Base or basis here means ‘support’ [rten], a support base on which to can develop bodhicitta. The supporting basis for the development of bodhicitta includes all representations of Buddha’s body, speech and mind: images, which represent Buddha’s body; books, which represent Buddha’s speech; and stūpas, which represent Buddha’s mind. The support also includes temples [gtsug lag khang] and places important in the Buddha’s life story such as his birthplace in Lumbini, the place of his enlightenment in Bodhgayā, the site of his first teaching in Sarnath, and the location of his parinirvāṇa in Kuśinagara. Furthermore, any place where bodhicitta is generated [sems bskyed gling], explained, practiced or studied is a support for developing bodhicitta and is a worthy object of prostration. To all these one may offer prostrations and pay respect as they are also representations [tshab] of the Buddha.

Text section 133 / stanza 25:

Preceptor of ṭrātimokṣa [so thar gyi mkhan po] refers to the person who gives precepts, from the precepts of the lay practitioner who accepts the three-fold refuge [skyabs gsum ‘dzin pa’i dge bsnyen] to the precepts of a fully ordained monk [dge slong]. Prātimokṣa means ‘individual liberation’ and refers to the seven sets of precepts [so thar ris bdun]:
the precepts for 1) fully ordained monks and 2) fully ordained nuns [dge slong pha ma gnyis], 3) monks and 4) nuns [dge tshul pha ma gnyis], 5) male lay practitioners and 6) female lay practitioners [dge bsnyen pha ma gnyis], and 7) probationary nuns [dge slob ma]. To all preceptors of prātimokṣa one pays respect.

You pay respect to all your teachers [slob dpon]. There are many types of teachers.
These include: the karma ācārya [las kyi slob dpon], the ‘the teacher to whom one reveals secrets’ [gsang ste ston pa’i slob dpon], the ‘quarter master’ [gnas sbyin pa’i slob dpon / gnas sbyin pa], ‘the reading and writing teacher’ [klog gi slob dpon] and so forth.105

When one receives the precepts of a monk [dge tshul gyi sdom pa] or the precepts of a fully ordained monk [dge slong gi sdom pa], the karma ācārya and the teacher to whom one reveals secrets are both needed. The karma ācārya functions as the preceptor during the ordination ceremony. The teacher to whom one reveals secrets asks the applicant prior to receiving his ordination many confidential questions such as whether he has committed any of the five crimes with immediate retribution [mtshams med pa lnga] and so forth. Based on the answers to these questions, the teacher can assess whether or not the applicant is allowed to receive monk ordination. The teacher must keep all this information secret and is not allowed to reveal it to others. The quarter master is necessary to see to the monks’ housing.

All these teachers are virtuous friends [dge ba’i bshes gnyen] and worthy of respect. You pay respect to everyone who has taught you something. It is said that a student who fails to pay respect to all of his teachers, even one who taught only a single four-line stanza, will certainly take rebirth as a dog. Dogs are generally looked down upon and mistreated in Asia.
Students whose minds are filled with pride, jealousy or aggression do not respect their teachers, failing to give respect to those who deserve it. A student should pay respect to his teachers first of all because they are endowed with positive qualities, and secondly because they have extended kindness to the student by sharing their qualities with him. Therefore, paying respect is a way of acknowledging the qualities [yon tan] and kindness [bka’ drin] of the teacher. Seeing the qualities in one’s teacher, one pays respect out of devotion and faith [dad pa]. Seeing the kindness of one’s teacher, one pays respect out of love [brtse ba]. Acknowledging and respecting the qualities in others leads to a happy and peaceful mind. A teacher’s duty is to teach the student, and the student’s duty is to respect his teachers.

When the Buddha was still on the path of a bodhisattva, he sometimes made offerings to demons and spirits because they were in possession of a few four-line stanzas of dharma. Thus, the Buddha, when still a bodhisattva, even acknowledged demons and spirits as his teachers, and paid them respect.

Moreover, one should pay respect to all followers of the Buddha and his teachings, from the most advanced practitioners of the tantric and monastic tradition to those who uphold only a mere token of the Buddha’s dress code, from the most eminent down to the lowest of practitioners. The term ‘discipline’, ‘practice’, or ‘tül-zhuk’ [brtul zhugs], refers to someone who has abandoned ordinary, worldly conduct [’jig rten tham gyi spyod pa phar brtul] and adopted [zhugs] the conduct of tantrikas or of monks.

‘Tül’ [brtul] connotes ‘abandoning’ [phar yug pa] and ‘destroying’ [med pa byed pa]; ‘zhuk’ [zhugs] means ‘adopting’ [tshur dang du len].

Becoming a practitioner, someone who maintains the discipline of a monk or a tantra, means a change in life-style as well as in dress. Tantrikas wear white robes [gos dkar] and do not cut their hair but wear it in long braids [lcang lo can]. Those who want to become monks give up their former life-style, shave their heads, and take on the three-fold saffron-colored robes. The saffron robes of a monk are a symbol of allegiance [khas len pa’i rtags]. A monk’s outfit in itself shows that he is someone who has pledged to keep the precepts of a monk.

Those who enter into the conduct of a ‘heruka’ might give up any kind of dress and roam naked in charnel grounds. Their unconventional dress and behavior is a sign of utter fearlessness. Those who wear the attire of long-haired tantrikas, dressing in white robes, indicate through their dress that they practice pure perception [dag snang], do the practice of six yogas and so forth.

Text section 134:
When you offer prostrations, first stand straight, in the posture endowed with the fourfold straightness [drang po bzhi ldaṅ]. When 1) the body is straight, the nadis (channels or meridians) are straight [lus drang na rtsa drang]. When 2) the nadis are straight, the prana is straight [rtsa drang na rlungs drang]. And when 3) the prana is straight, (4) the mind is straight [rlungs drang na sems drang].

Sometimes imagine that your body multiplies into infinite bodies, emanations of yourself, and offer prostrations simultaneously with all these emanated bodies. At other times, imagine your father to your right, your mother to your left, your enemies in front of you, and infinite sentient beings around you. Imagine offering prostrations with all of them.

Join your hands with fingertips, thumbs and wrists touching, leaving a space between your palms, and imagine that you hold a big jewel [nor bu] between them. Think that you offer this jewel to the buddhas when you do your prostrations. You can also imagine that the palms of your hands are joined like a lotus bud that is just starting to bloom. According to Chinese custom, pressing your palms tightly together, is a ‘gesture of suffering’ [mya ngan gi phyag].

You touch the wrists of your cupped palms to three places: first, to the top of your head, right at the crown [spyi gtsug], or to your forehead [dral ba], second your throat center and third your heart center, right at your sternum. While making these gestures, remember the qualities of Buddha’s body, speech and mind. Make the aspiration that the obscurations of body, speech and mind of all sentient beings and yourself may be purified and that all may achieve 1) the invisible ushnisha [gtsug tor ltar mi mgon pa] on the tops of their heads, 2) the three lines of the dharma conch [chos kyi dung] at their throat centers, and 3) the infinite knot [dpal gyi be’u] at their heart centers. The infinite knot means that the mind of the Buddha is endless [mtha’ med pa], inexhaustible [rdzogs rgyu med pa / zad mi shes pa], and cannot be fathomed by the intellect.

Text section 138:

The four means of attraction [bsdu ba’i dngos po bzhi ; skr. catuhasaṇghavastu] are four methods for attracting disciples: 1) ‘generosity’ [sbyin pa], 2) ‘speaking in a pleasant manner’ [snyan par smra ba], 3) ‘purposeful activities’ [don spyod pa], and 4) ‘consistency between words and actions’ [don mthun pa]. The term worldly dharma [byis pa’i chos] literally means ‘child-like dharma’, referring to the dharma of child-like, ordinary, worldly beings [byis pa so so’i skye bo ‘jig rten pa’i chos]. Buddha called ordinary sentient beings ‘children’ because their minds have not ripened [sems ma smin pa].
Text section 139:

The five obscurations [sgrub pa lnga] are: 1) sensual desire [’dod pa la ‘dun], 2) ill-will [gnod sems], 3) sloth and torpor [rmugs pa dang gnyid], 4) excitement and guilt [rgod pa dang ’gyod pa], and 5) doubt [the tshom]. Other teachings list them as: 1) attachment [’dod chags], 2) ignorance and sleep [rmugs pa and gnyid], 3) regret [’gyod pa], 4) distraction [g.yeng ba], and 5) doubt [the tshom].

The five capacities [dbang po lnga] are: 1) the capacity of faith [dad pa’i dbang po], 2) the capacity of diligence [brtson ’grus kyi dbang po], 3) the capacity of remembering [dran pa’i dbang po], 4) the capacity of meditation [ting ne’ dzin gyi dbang po], and 5) the capacity of knowledge [shes rab kyi dbang po].

The five sense pleasures [’dod pa’i yon tan lnga] are: 1) sight [gzugs], 2) sound [sgra], 3) smell [dri], 4) taste [ro], and 5) touch [reg bya].

The five supernatural perceptions [mgon par shes pa lnga] are: 1) the supernatural perception of magical powers [rdzu ‘phrul gyi mgon shes], 2) the supernatural perception of the divine eye [lha’i mig gi mgon shes], 3) the supernatural perception of the divine ear [lha’i rna ba’i mgon shes], 4) the supernatural perception of recalling former existences [sngon gras rjes su dran gyi mgon shes], and 5) the supernatural perception of knowing the minds of other people [gzhan sems shes pa’i mgon shes].

The five eyes [mig lnga / spyan lnga] are: 1) the physical eye [sha’i spyan], 2) the divine eye [lha’i spyan], 3) the eye of knowledge [shes rab kyi spyan], 4) the dharma eye [chos kyi spyan], and 5) the wisdom eye [ye shes kyi spyan].

The five classes of beings [’gro ba rgyud lnga / ’gro ba lnga] are: 1) hell beings [dmyal ba], 2) hungry ghosts [yi dvags], 3) animals [dud ’gro], 4) humans [mi], and 5) gods [lha]. Here the asuras are included with the gods.

Prostrations or paying respect [phyag ‘tshal] is a ‘gesture of respect’ [gus pa] and a ‘gesture of joy’ [dga’ ba] toward someone else expressed with body, speech and mind. The true prostration is made with the mind. Externally, you express this joyful mind [sems dga’ ba] with a respectful physical gesture. Prostration is ‘wishing to approach nearer’ [nye bo bzo ‘dod yod]. The essence [ngo bo] of prostration is ‘intimate respect’ [nye bar gus pa].

The etymology [nges tshig] of the Tibetan word ‘chak-tsal-wa’ [phyag ‘tshal ba], ‘prostration’ or ‘paying respect’, is as follows. ‘Chak’ means ‘hand’ [lag pa], ‘sign’ [rtags], or ‘gesture’ [phyag rgya]; ‘tsal-wa’ means ‘to do’ or ‘to make’ [byed pa]. The word ‘chak-tsal-wa’ can be interpreted as ‘to show a sign’ or ‘make a gesture’ [rtags bstan].
For instance, one can make various gestures of respect with one’s eyes [mig gis phyag 'tshal ba], gestures of close appreciation [nye bar gus pa'i rtags] or even heartfelt appreciation [snying nas dga’ ba'i rtags]. Any kind of gesture, movement or sign expressed with the body in a respectful state of mind is called a prostration, a gesture of respect. You are expressing, on the external level, an internal, emotional experience of appreciation, joy and love.

Human beings have different ways of showing joy and respect according to their cultures. Some nod their heads in appreciation and acknowledgement; others bow or join their hands in anjali mudra, the joined palms, as a gesture of respect. In China and Japan monks show respect by raising one hand in front of their chests. All these gestures of respect [phyag 'tshal ba] are ways of expressing the wish to become closer with the other person. Arrogant or proud people do not show respect to others, since that would require humbling themselves. Showing respect through physical prostrations is thus an antidote to arrogance and pride [nga rgyal]. Offering prostration functions [byed las] to defeat arrogance [nga rgyal 'joms pa].

When you make prostrations you acknowledge [khas len] that the object of prostration has greater qualities than yourself. You open up to the qualities inherent in the object of prostration. If you want to acquire the qualities of the three jewels for yourself, the first step is to acknowledge and pay respect to them through prostrations. If the object is devoid of any quality then there is no need to offer prostration. To show respect to those who have no qualities is a sign of foolishness. On the other hand, arrogant or proud people who refuse to pay respect to the positive qualities of others cannot hope to attain such qualities for themselves.

The benefit [phan yon] of offering prostration is that one becomes a basis [rten] or foundation [gzhil] on which qualities can develop and increase. The mind of the person who offers prostration becomes open and stable, and, therefore, becomes a suitable vessel for the development of qualities.

There are distinct levels [dbyer ba] of prostration, prostrations of the highest, middling and lowest levels. The highest level of prostration is the ‘prostration of meeting the view’ [rab lta ba mjal ba’i phyag]. Recognizing the view of the natural state to a certain extent already qualifies as a ‘prostration’. Recognizing the view is called a ‘wisdom prostration’ [ye shes kyi phyag] or a ‘knowledge prostration’ [shes rab gyi phyag].

Generally, you offer prostration to the object of your faith and devotion: to the Buddha and your root guru. To truly understand the Buddha or the root guru means to realize the view. Once you have recognized the view, you automatically recognize your root guru as the Buddha. Recognizing the view means to open up [kha 'byed pa] one’s mind and become close or intimate [nye bo] with the buddha nature. In the recognition of the buddha nature, one meets the Buddha. The supreme prostration is a total fusing of one’s own mind with the mind of the root guru, the Buddha, and thus with buddha nature. Simply approaching buddha nature, even if only through theoretical understanding, qualifies as a ‘prostration’, a ‘prostration of theoretical understanding’ [go ba’i phyag]. On the path to buddhahood, complete enlightenment, one must traverse many lesser levels. The more one advances, the closer one gets to the genuine view.

To recognize the view means to recognize awareness. Recognizing the view is the highest form of prostration. You meet the mind of the Buddha. This is the ‘prostration of ultimate truth’ [don dam pa’i phyag], the ‘prostration of the view’.

The middling level of prostration is the ‘prostration of practicing meditation’ [sgom pa bsgoms pa’i phyag]. Reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha, generating faith, devotion, certainty etc, are ‘prostrations of relative truth’ [kun rdzob gyi phyag]. The practitioner has gained confidence in the qualities of his root guru and the Buddha, bringing these qualities again and again to mind. He practices with mindfulness and does not forget the qualities of his guru. In doing so he brings himself ever closer [nye bo] to the guru and the view.

Mindfulness [dran pa] is indispensible for a practitioner. A beginner needs to maintain mindfulness with effort. As he advances in the view, he will slowly arrive at effortless mindfulness, awareness itself. The beginner must also practice introspection [shes bzhi]. He needs to know what to do and what to avoid. He further needs to scrutinize his body, speech and mind to determine whether he is following what he is supposed to do. That is called introspection.

The lowest form of prostration is the full body prostration called the ‘prostration endowed with the three kinds of faith’ [mos gus gsum Idan gyi phyag]. When you practice full prostrations, you are consciously assuming the lowest place possible. You cannot lower yourself more than stretching your body flat on the ground. While prostrating in this way, you recite the lines of refuge and recollect the qualities of the object of your prostration with a mind infused with faith and devotion.

Prostrations must be done in a joyous state of mind. Some people really dislike offering prostrations. If such people do prostrations intensively, their anger only increases. But they should still do a few in order to confront their aversion. Every practitioner should offer at least three prostrations every morning in front of their shrines before starting their meditation session. My teacher, Khenpo Pentse [mkhan po pad ma tshe dbang], continued to offer five hundred prostrations every day, even when he was an old man.

Offering prostration is a very powerful practice, a skillful means that helps deal with afflictions. It helps subdue physical diseases and gives relief when one is depressed. When you are livid with anger, a few prostrations can help you out of this state of mind. When you feel restless and think you must leave your meditation seat and go outside, just offer a few prostrations, and you will already have a different perspective. When you cannot sleep at night, get up and do a few prostrations.

Some people are overly concerned about bodily comfort, pampering their bodies too much. Such people should really do full prostrations to overcome their attachment to their bodies. The body is just a temporary dwelling and will be left behind when we die. From time to time you need to reduce your attachment to your body and throw it on the ground in full prostration.

Moreover, you need at some times to overcome the fixation on cleanliness and hygiene. At times, when you see a statue in a temple, do prostrations right where you first spot it, even if the place is dusty and dirty. Overcome all doubts and hesitations. However, you should never think that offering prostration is simply a good and healthy exercise. This is a worldly motivation and does not get you anywhere.

Although the body must regularly be fed and cared for, your mind and emotions actually require much more care and attention. Remember that pride and jealousy are hidden thoughts and emotions [khog ‘gyur gi rnam rtog] and you never know to what extent they possess your mind. Anger, desire and ignorance are more easily detected. To overcome subtle and unnoticed pride and arrogance, therefore, practitioners should do a few prostrations every day.

The moment you notice pride or arrogance arising in your mind, strike these afflictions down through prostrations, like flattening and beating down something that comes up out of the ground. This is called ‘flattening pride’ [nga rgyal ‘bur mnyam / ngal rgyal ‘bur ‘joms byed pa].

If you do not know Tibetan language and liturgy, just say, “Buddha Śākyamuni, please think of me,” then prostrate to him with heartfelt devotion. Know that the Buddha is omniscient and that the moment you think of him or visualize him sitting in front of you, he is there in actuality. Know that for Buddha there is no near or far. The moment you recollect him, he is present. Know further that the Buddha has no likes and dislikes. Never think you are unworthy of his consideration. The love that Buddha feels for the bodhisattvas of the tenth level and the love he feels for a little insect are exactly the same.

When you feel devotion welling up in your heart, it is completely acceptable to compose your own devotional songs and chants. Call out to the Buddha any time you feel like it. When you are alone at home practicing or in retreat, you can talk straight to the Buddha’s wisdom body. Call out to the Buddha, “Now! Please let me realize the essence of my mind. I need this right now. I will call out until you grant me realization.” In this fashion supplicate the Buddha and offer prostrations in a state of intense longing. This is not about numbers of prostrations to be accomplished. It is about your certainty that the Buddha is present in front of you, the certainty that he can grant you ultimate realization right now. Sometimes one prostration done with that kind of certainty is worth more than a hundred thousand done if your heart is not in it.

Supreme Dzogchen practitioners are those who are truly able to practice awareness recognition [rig pa rkyang ‘ded] alone. Such practitioners are extremely rare. Most of us must apply various methods to tame or inspire our minds. But even for such supreme practitioners who can practice awareness alone, prostrations will only benefit and not harm. That kind of yogin will be an example for others. Even one who has recognized the view and is liberated from the expectation of enlightenment should always engage in gathering the two accumulations. For the benefit of others, practitioners who have reached a high level of realization and learning still maintain relative dharma practice. Although Paltrül Rinpoche had taught the Bodhicharyavatara over one hundred times, he continued to act as though he himself was still deepening his understanding of the text. In this way, he set an example for others.

The Buddha himself had reached complete enlightenment and yet he manifested a conduct attentive to many subtle details. Even his manner of eating rice was an example to others. This is why enlightened masters do not act out their realization of the ultimate view but rather set an example of proper practice and behavior on the relative level.

The Buddha meets the needs of each of his followers although they have different capacities for understanding the dharma. He appears to both the dull-minded and those of highest intelligence in appropriate ways. There is no single method, technique or teaching that will tame the minds of all people. The Vajrayana teachings are Buddha’s private teachings. The teachings of the Great Perfection are his innermost secret teachings. With these various levels of teachings, Buddha taught every possible method to tame the minds of beings. Offering prostration is one method, one skillful practice among many, easy to learn and easy to do.

Text section 142:

Going for refuge is the doorway to all teachings [chos thams cad kyi sgo dbye]. What is the meaning [don dag] or the essence [ngo bo] of going for refuge? Going for refuge is essentially ‘acceptance’ [khas len], ‘commitment’ [dam bar’ ba] and ‘certainty’ [thag chod pa]. It is the thought: “From today onwards, until the attainment of enlightenment (Mahāyāna) or until I die, (Hinayāna), I accept [khas len] the Buddha as the one who shows the path [lam bstan mkhan], I commit to him [dam bca’ ba], and on this I am resolved [thag chod].”

If a student lacks acceptance [khas len], commitment [dam bca’ ba] and resolve [thag chod pa] concerning the three jewels, the door to all teachings is closed. You cannot call yourself a Buddhist without having acceptance, commitment and resolve concerning the Buddha, dharma and sangha. Therefore, ‘going for refuge’ opens the door to all teachings and Buddhist practices.

A beginner needs to learn about the three jewels and their qualities. Without knowledge of the three jewels no one can go for refuge. The first step is to identify the three jewels, to be introduced to their qualities and to understand the reason [rgyu mtshan] for going for refuge. After understanding the qualities of the three jewels, the beginner can develop faith, the basis of refuge [skyabs ‘gro ba’i rgyu].

Going for refuge is the basis for all Buddhist precepts [sdom pa thams cad kyi gzhi rten]. Anyone can take precepts and vows. A precept [sdom pa] means that you bind or guard [bsdoms] your mind with a thought. The terms ‘precept’ and ‘discipline’ [tshul khrims] have the same meaning. Discipline means keeping rules that are in harmony with the way things really are [dngos po gnas tshul dang mthun pa’i khrims brung mkhan tshul khrims].

When you commit in your mind, “I will abstain from doing this and that,” you have taken a precept. You can commit to many precepts, pledges and vows, but if you haven’t first taken refuge, you are not maintaining any Buddhist precept, pledge or vow. Without knowing about the three jewels, you are ignorant about the dharma and have no idea about how or what kinds of precepts to take. The precepts of individual liberation [so thar], the trainings of the bodhisattvas [byang sems kyi bslab pa], and the samayas [dam tshig] of Vajrayana are all based on going for refuge.

All dharma practice begins with going for refuge. If you have truly gone for refuge this indicates that all of your doubts about the three jewels have been eradicated. Only when you have cut through doubts can you successfully practice the dharma. The practice of refuge also functions as a remedy for doubt [the tshom gyi gnyen po].

No precepts, from the eight precepts observed for one day [bsnyen gnas yan lag brgyad pa] to the Secret Mantrayana precepts, are ever given to a person who has not already gone for refuge.

The eight precepts observed for one day are: 1) not to kill [srog gcod pa]; 2) not to steal [ma byin par len]; 3) not to have sexual intercourse [mi tshangs par spyod pa]; 4) not to lie [rdzun du smra ba]; 5) not to take intoxicating beverages [myos par ’gyur pa’i chang]; 6) not to dance [gar], listen to or play songs [glu] or music [rol mo], and not to wear ornaments [rgyan], garlands [phreng ba] or perfumes [spos nyug]; 7) not to sleep on a high or large bed [khi stan che mthol]; and 8) not to eat after midday [dus ma yin pa’i kha zas]. Lay practitioners take these precepts on special days such as the new or full moon, or on special days that commemorate events in the life of the Buddha.

Text sections 144-145:

Going for refuge is the source of all qualities [yon tan thams cad kyi ‘byung gnas]. Practicing any of the Hinayāna, Mahāyāna or Vajrayana teachings, without having received the refuge precepts, brings no benefit whatsoever. Just as you cannot build a house without a foundation, you cannot practice dharma without the foundation of refuge.

Having received the refuge precepts, however, all your practices will produce positive results. If you have not resolved all your doubts about the qualities of Buddha, dharma and sangha, whatever teaching you might practice will be without great benefit. When you go for refuge you have to decide in your mind that you believe in karma, in the law of cause and effect. You decide that you believe in the enlightened Buddha as the supreme teacher. You decide that you believe in the dharma as the path that you personally want to follow, and you decide that you trust in Buddha’s enlightened followers as your companions along the path. When you have resolved all your doubts about these basic beliefs, your dharma practice will be fruitful.

Once Milarepa was asked by his students whether he was an incarnation [sprul sku] of some great master. That question upset him greatly and he told his students they had wrong views about the dharma. Milarepa said that he had attained his qualities because he had faith in the law of cause and effect. That kind of faith is based on going for refuge since the very foundation of going for refuge is belief in the law of cause and effect.

Going for refuge in a genuine fashion gives rise to all temporary [gnas skabs kyi yon tan] and ultimate qualities [mthar thug gi yon tan]. Whoever takes refuge in the three jewels with pure acceptance, commitment and resolve will certainly be a good person in this life, and in his future life will attain one of the three higher realms [mtho ris gsum] of samsara. Taking genuine refuge will result in prolonging one’s life [tshe ring po] and reducing one’s illnesses [nad med pa], and will lead to a blissful mind [sems bde po]. Someone who has really taken the refuge precepts to heart is naturally a person endowed with qualities [yon tan dang ldan pa’i mi]. As he has accepted and committed himself to the Buddha, the dharma and the sangha, he has promised to develop the qualities of knowledge [shes rab] and compassion [snying rje] that were already present in his mind. How do you distinguish between good and bad persons? The dividing line is whether the person has knowledge and compassion or not.
Going for refuge with knowledge and faith will give birth to immeasurable qualities: a peaceful mind, a blissful mind, a mind without suffering, increasing knowledge, increasing compassion and so on. The ultimate qualities eventually achieved through taking refuge are the qualities of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. If you study the ‘dharma of statements’ [lun], the three baskets [sde snod gsum], as well as the ‘dharma of realization’ [rtogs pa], the three precious trainings [bslab pa rin po che gsum], you will understand the infinite qualities of Buddha, dharma and sangha. The Buddha has infinite qualities of body, speech, and mind, the qualities of a mind at peace [sems zhi ba'i yon tan].

Going for refuge marks the difference between Buddhists and non-Buddhists and causes you to enter into the ranks of the Buddhists [phyi dang nang gi khyad par byed 'byed pa dang sangs rgyas pa'i gral du tshud pa byed]. Buddhists are called ‘insiders’ and non-Buddhists ‘outsiders’. Insiders, or Buddhists [nang pa], are those who are inside the dharma. To be inside the dharma means to be inside the unity of knowledge and compassion. The dividing line between a Buddhist and a non-Buddhist is having acceptance, commitment and resolve to the three jewels. Without these one is not a Buddhist. A Buddhist has the commitment to practice and develop knowledge and compassion. The short definition of dharma is ‘knowledge and compassion’. That means a Buddhist is a practitioner of knowledge and compassion.

When you are asked, “Why do you call yourself a Buddhist?” then the answer is, “I am a Buddhist because I have accepted and committed myself to the three jewels.” The distinction between Buddhist and non-Buddhist is not based on the belief in the existence or non-existence of a personal identity [gang zag gi bdag]. Were that the case many Buddhists would be classified as non-Buddhists.

Generally, one can distinguish ‘four main shrāvaka schools’ [nyan thos kyi rtsa ba'i sde bzhig],108 which include the ‘eighteen sub-schools of the shrāvakas’ [nyan thos sde pa bco bgyad]. These four main schools are: 1) the seven sub-schools of the Sarvāstivādins [thams cad yod smra'i sde pa bdun],109 2) the five sub-schools of the Mahāsāṅghikas [dge 'dun phal chen sde pa lnga],110 3) the three sub-schools of the Sthaviras [gnas brtan sde pa gsum],111 and 4) the three sub-schools of Sanmitīyas [mang bkur sde pa gsum].112 One of these eighteen sub-schools called Vātsīputriya, the followers of Vātsīputra [gnas ma bu pa'i sde pa], holds a view that believes in the existence of a personal identity. So do many Buddhist lay practitioners, who think, “I have an identity. I can feel my identity.” Nonetheless, they believe in the three jewels. Therefore, the distinction

The Sarvāstivādin school was associated with Sanskrit, the Mahāsāṅghika school was associated with Pāli, the Sthavira school was associated with Prākrit, and the Sanmitīya school was associated with Aphabhransa.
The seven sub-schools of the Sarvāstivādins [gzhin thams cad yod par smra ba’i sde pa bdun]: 1) Mūlasarvāstivādins [gzhin thams cad yod par smra ba’i sde pa], 2) Kāśyapīyas [‘od srung gi sde pa], 3) Mahāśāsakas [sa ston pa’i sde pa], 4) Dharmaguptakas [chos srung gi sde pa], 5) Bahusrutiyaśas [mang thos kyi sde pa], 6) Tāmrashāfiyas [gos dmar ba’i sde pa], and 7) Vibhajyavādins [rnam par phy ye smra ba’i sde pa].

The five sub-schools of the Mahāśāṅghikas [dge ‘dun phal sde pa lnga]: 1) Pūrvavāśailikas [shar gyi ri bo la gnas pa’i sde], 2) Aparashailikas [nub gyi ri bo la gnas pa’i sde], 3) Haimavatas [gangs rir gnas pa’i sde], 4) Lokottaravādins [’jig rten ‘das par smra ba’i sde], and 5) Prajñāptivādins [btags par smra ba’i sde].

The three sub-schools of the Sthaviras [gna brtan sde pa gsum]: 1) Mahāvīravāsins [gtsug lag khang chen gnas pa’i sde], 2) Jeyanīyas [rgyal byed tshal gnas pa’i sde], and 3) Abhayagirivāsins [’jigs med ri gnas pa’i sde].

The three sub-schools Sanmitīyas [mang pos bkra’i sde ba gsum] are: 1) Kaurukullakas [sa sgrog ri la gnas pa’i sde], 2) Avantakas [srung ba’i sde ba] and 3) Vatsīputriyas [gna ma bu’i sde pa]. See Map of the Profound, pages 209-218; Blue Annals, pages 27-33.

Between Buddhist and non-Buddhist should be based solely on going for refuge to the three jewels.

Text section 147:

One Indian student of Lord Atisha named Kṣitigarbha [sa’i snying po] had studied the canons of both Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings three times each but still could not settle on the Buddhist view, saying that he could not detect any difference between the systems. In his mind both systems and philosophies seemed to be almost the same. In actuality, there are many similarities in the words as the systems influenced each other with regard to meditation deities, yogic exercises [tsa rlung], rituals, philosophical views and so forth. If you merely examine different systems or religions with the comparative attitude of a scholar, you can never decide which path to follow. Conviction comes only from going for refuge. Kṣitigarbha got carried away by words and concepts and, therefore, could not decide on the three jewels as his refuge.

Lord Atisha was so disappointed by this that he said, “Although the six gatekeeper panditas and others are still alive in India, my own teacher, SPintavani, has passed away. I will now go to Tibet since people in India cannot distinguish between a Buddhist and a non-Buddhist system.” Since Atisha thought that despite their great learning people in India did not understand that the distinction between a Buddhist and a non-Buddhist was solely based on going for refuge to the three jewels, in Tibet Atisha taught only refuge. Tibetan scholars and students once complained, “Even when we request you to teach something else, you won’t. From now on we’re just going to call you Pandita of Refuge, ‘The Beginner’s Pandita.’” Rather than feeling insulted, Atisha was delighted and replied, “Now I am someone who furthers the teaching of the Buddha even through his nickname.”
The title ‘Pandita of Refuge’ was meant as a putdown, indicating that Atisha was a lama who knew no other teaching but refuge. It was like calling this great scholar a teacher of ABCs'. Lord Atisha took no offence in this at all but on the contrary was most delighted since every single teaching of the Buddha is included within taking refuge to the three jewels. He was happy that his nickname advertised him as a specialist in refuge and let other people understand that he was someone who furthered the Buddhist teaching.

The term six gatekeeper panditas [mkhas pa’i sgo drug] refers to a group of great scholars from the Buddhist university of Vikramashila. According to Tāranātha’s History of Buddhism,113 Prajñākaramati was the keeper of the southern gate; according to the Blue Annals,114 he was the keeper of the western gate.

Text section 148:

Drigung Kyobpa said, “In short, all sublime teachings can be condensed into only refuge.” That is a very profound point. All nine consecutive vehicles of Buddhism can be condensed into the practice of refuge. All relative teachings are contained within the outer and the inner refuge. All absolute teachings are contained within the secret and the absolute refuge.

If a practitioner does not have acceptance, commitment and resolve regarding the three jewels, he will find that many Buddhist and non-Buddhist teachings seem to be quite similar. He will be unable to decide on one path but will simply continue to compare teachings.

Fundamentally, all masters from all religions are in essence the same as all beings share the same buddha nature. As far as their individual paths are concerned, however, we find great differences. Different paths lead to different results. Although all beings share the same buddha nature, if a religious path does not develop the qualities inherent in that buddha nature, the fruition of that path will not be in accord with the buddha nature and thus will not lead to enlightenment. When people state that all religions lead to the same result, you should ask what they mean by such a statement. How are they same? Based on what comparable qualities are they same? Based on what do you decide that paths taught by Buddha, Jesus and Shiva lead to the same result?

People who hold this all-inclusive attitude are only speaking from a superficial viewpoint, not going into much depth. To really discern the crucial points of different religions and beliefs, one must examine the aspects of ground, path and fruition116 as well as the aspects of view, meditation and conduct.117
The Buddha dharma is not a religion [chos lugs] and, although it manifests in a religious and cultural context, it does not depend on any culture. The dharma taught by the Buddha is nothing other than the way things naturally are [gnas lugs]. Therefore, one way of thinking considers that anyone with knowledge and compassion is a Buddhist, regardless of whether or not he follows the formal system of Buddhism.

The nine consecutive vehicles [theg pa rim pa dgu] are the vehicles of the 1) shrāvakas [nyan thos kyi theg pa; skr. shrāvakayāna], 2) the pratyekabuddhas [rang rgyal gyi theg pa; skr. pratyekabuddhayāna] and 3) the bodhisattvas [byang chub sms pa’i theg pa; skr. bodhisattvayāna]. The Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra belongs to the vehicles of the bodhisattvas. This first three vehicles are called the ‘three common vehicles’ [thun mong gi theg pa gsum]. The vehicles of 4) kriyā tantra [bya ba’i rgyud kyi theg pa], 5) ubhaya tantra [upa’i rgyud kyi theg pa], and 6) caryā tantra [spyod pa’i rgyud kyi theg pa] are called ‘the three extraordinary inner vehicles’ [thun min nang gi theg pa gsum]. Most practices of Tārā belong to either kriyātantra or caryātantra. The vehicles of 7) mahāyāna [rnal ’byor chen po’i theg pa], 8) anuyoga [rjes su rnal ’byor gyi theg pa] and 9) atiyoga mahāsandhi [rdzogs pa chen po shin tu rnal ’byor gyi theg pa] are called ‘the three extraordinary secret vehicles’ [thun min gsang ba’i theg pa gsum].

However, the potential knowledge and compassion that individuals may have in their minds are not in themselves sufficient to bring about enlightenment. That potential needs to be discovered and developed. This is where the Buddhist tradition can help the individual. Although the sun radiates heat by its very nature, a magnifying glass is required to set a piece of paper on fire by using that heat. In the same way, the many techniques taught by the Buddha and great masters are needed so that the potential inherent in people’s minds can be actualized.

Some people think, “I like Buddhism, I’ve read a few books and have some understanding. In fact, I’m already a Buddhist. I don’t need a teacher.” Such people have only very limited and unstable merit [bsod nams]. Although they might have a good connection to the three jewels from previous lifetimes, they still need to re-enter the path in this life in order to develop and progress. Simply calling oneself a Buddhist and reading books on Buddhism, without actually relying on the three jewels through taking refuge, is like mistaking a small pond for the ocean. There is much, much more to achieve.

A practitioner should have heartfelt confidence in and knowledge about the three jewels. He should be able to explain the qualities of Buddha, dharma and sangha to others when asked. He should be able to explain the meaning of taking refuge when asked.

Text section 150:
There are four kinds of faith [dad pa rnam pa bzhi]: 1) the faith of amazement [dang ba’i dad pa], 2) the faith of inspiration [‘dod pa’i dad pa], 3) the faith of certainty [yid ches kyi dad pa], and 4) irreversible faith [phyir mi ldog pa’i dad pa]. The true basis [rgyu’am gzhi] of going for refuge is irreversible faith.

Faith of amazement [dang ba’i dad pa] arises due to a karmic connection from former lifetimes, through the merit [bsod nams] one accumulated in former lifetimes. This faith is a feeling [tshor ba] of naturally arising devotion—feeling drawn to the three jewels without having reflected on them. When hearing about Buddhism, people react very differently. Some start crying the first time they see a statue of the Buddha, hear the name ‘Buddha’, the word ‘emptiness’ or the names of great Buddhist masters. Other people start to cry after hearing just a few words from the teachings, although they do not understand the meaning of the words or why they feel so moved. An ancient Indian story recounted in Mipham Rinpoche’s commentary to the Shakayamuni liturgy tells of a child who looked with total amazement [ha le ba] at a painting of the Buddha for three days.

Faith of amazement leads to interest in the teachings of the Buddha, and is a step toward the faith of inspiration, also called ‘eager faith’ or ‘inspired faith’ [‘dod pa’i dad pa], when a person becomes eager, inspired and interested to learn more about the dharma. One wants to emulate the masters or the Buddha. Inspired faith is the thought, “I must practice the dharma.”

Faith of certainty [yid ches pa’i dad pa] is the thought, “In this world my true place of trust, my real point of reference is the three jewels. I am totally committed to them and have resolved all doubts about them.” For this faith to arise one must be either knowledgeable about the qualities of the three jewels, thus knowing the reason for one’s faith and devotion, or one can be ignorant about the qualities but resolved in one’s faith, like the old lady who prostrated to a dog’s tooth believing it to be a relic of the Buddha. Her faith of certainty was such that relics truly appeared from the tooth.

Some practitioners of the dharma generate faith from the very beginning, are committed to the teachings, and have utter confidence in their commitment [dam bca’] to their faith. That is a sign of contact with the dharma from previous lifetimes. Faith of certainty is more difficult to achieve than faith of amazement and faith of inspiration. Faith of certainty can be attained through study and practice, but can also be lost. For an ordinary practitioner, these three types of faith might flare up when in the presence of the masters and later subside. The support of your dharma friends may be necessary to maintain inspiration and devotion. Requiring the support of others, these first three types of faith are unstable.

Irreversible faith [phyir mi ldog pa’i dad pa] on the other hand is unshakeable and can never be lost. Irreversible faith is stable certainty [nges shes brtan po] that does not rely on others. One has not the slightest doubt about the three jewels, and no one can create any doubt in one’s mind. All doubts have been fully resolved [thag chod pa]. Irreversible faith means that the practitioner can withstand all kinds of obstacles [bar chad bzod thub pa] and cannot be tempted by any promises of samsara. Through no circumstances will he lose faith and devotion to the three jewels. Gendün Chöphel once said in his ‘third scattered poem’ [thor bu gsum pa]:

Fools do not follow me,
And I do not follow fools.
That is the foremost vow of the wise.
Even when my life is at stake, I will endeavor to keep it.

blun pos rang gi rjes su mi ’brang yang rang nyid blun po’i rjes su mi brang ba de ni khas pa’i dam tshig dang po ste srog la babs kyang ’bad pas srung bar bya

Irreversible faith is the true basis of going for refuge as it never can be lost. Such irreversible faith comes about only through genuine recognition of the view. With this stable certainty [nges shes brtan po], neither gods nor demons can obstruct one’s practice.

118 See Word of My Perfect Teacher, pages (???)

Even for a beginner who has not yet achieved irreversible faith refuge is still based utterly on faith [dad pa] and certainty [nges shes]. Without certainty in your commitment to the three jewels, regardless of how much knowledge you may have about Buddhism or how much practice you have done, you are not a true Buddhist.

As Mipham Rinpoche said:

If nobility of certainty is not born,
How could you ever cut through negativity of misconceptions?
nges shes bzang po ma skye na
sgro skur ngan pa ga la gcod

Repeatedly going for refuge eradicates the habitual patterns of former lifetimes. In countless former lifetimes we have built up habitual patterns of doubt [the tshom] and afflictions [nyon mongs]. Taking refuge once does not eradicate these patterns. These patterns, which have a very strong hold on us, are only loosened when going for refuge becomes a dominant feature in our minds. Only when the habitual patterns of our minds change, is it possible to gain irreversible faith.
Text section 151:

One takes the three jewels as one’s refuge, accepts [khas len] them and commits to them [dam bca’ ba] in order to free oneself from suffering and fears. Were one truly free of all mental fear and physical suffering, one would have no reason to seek refuge or practice the dharma. But, realizing that we have fear and suffering, we go for refuge to the three jewels. Going for refuge means seeking protection.

The essence of refuge is acceptance, commitment and resolve toward the three jewels. One accepts the Buddha as the one who shows the path [lam bstan mkhan], commits to him and resolves all doubts about him. One accepts the dharma as the path that one wants to accomplish, commits to it, and resolves all doubts about it. One accepts the sangha to be one’s companions along the path, commits to them, and resolves all doubts about them.

Going for refuge must not be confused with a supplication [gsol ’debs]. Having a problem and praying to the three jewels for protection is a supplication. A supplication is a prayer such as, “Please protect me, please grant me your blessings, please help me.” Going for refuge is more than simply a supplication. An aspiration [smon lam] is different from a supplication. Making an aspiration one wishes for something good or auspicious to happen [yong bar shog shig], as for example, “May all beings be happy.” A supplication would be, “Grant all beings happiness.” A supplication is like someone in trouble with the law who gives bribes [lkog nor] to an official, and makes the request, “Please help me so that I will not be punished.”

Since going for refuge is acceptance [khas len], commitment [dam bca’ ba] and decisiveness [thag chod pa] concerning the three jewels, one generates the thought, “From now on, whether I am happy or sad, in good times or bad, in all circumstances, whether I am up or down, whatever happens, I put all my hopes in the three jewels and in nothing or no one else.” With this thought in mind one accepts the three jewels and commits to them.

Suplicating the three jewels will bring blessings and is important, but suppling the three jewels is not the same as taking refuge. Refuge means accepting Buddha as your teacher, the dharma as your path and the sangha as your companions who help along the path. One commits to them, being certain about them. One thinks, “I will rely only on the three jewels.”

Text section 152:

The third chapter of the Sūtrālankāra [mdo rgyan] teaches about refuge and also explains the term ‘refuge’ [skyabs su ‘gro ba] as ‘acceptance’ [khas len] in the phrase:
Understand that because this (person) has the wish (to obtain in himself) the real (three jewels), also his acceptance (is born) out of compassion and love ['di ni de dngos 'dod-pas khas len de yang snying brtse las rig bya].119

Text section 153:

Many distinctions are possible regarding going for refuge. One can classify going for refuge according to the objects of refuge [skyabs yul], distinguishing between outer, inner, secret and absolute refuge. Khenpo Kunpal here makes a distinction between worldly refuge ['jig rten pa'i skyabs 'gro] and transcendental refuge ['jig rten las 'das pa'i skyabs 'gro]. The transcendental refuges are the Hinayāna refuge and the Mahāyāna refuge. Mahāyāna refuge is comprised of two sections: temporary causal refuge [gnas skabs rgyu'i skyabs 'gro] and ultimate resultant refuge [mthar thug 'bras bu'i skyabs 'gro]. All these various types of refuge must be distinguished according to the motivation [kun slong] with which one seeks it.

Text sections 154-155:

Worldly refuge is not a Buddhist refuge. People from certain cultures, based on fear, take as their refuge objects mountains, forests, trees, stones, non-Buddhist stūpas ['jig rten pa'i mchod rten] and so forth, thinking that a god [lha] or a spirit [gzhi bdag] resides at those locations. Frightened by demons and diseases, people seek refuge in spirits and gods that reside at various places. As these spirits dwell within samsara and have not gone beyond suffering themselves, they are not an object of Buddhist refuge. They have no power to liberate people from suffering.

119 For more details see text section 161.
216 Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations

People may seek refuge in Indra [bṛgya byin], Brahma [tshangs pa], Īśvara [dbang phyug], Viṣṇu [khyab 'jug] or among the gods of the eight classes [sde bṛgyad]. None of these gods and spirits are themselves liberated from the suffering of samsara; they cannot, therefore, grant refuge from samsara. Whether these gods and spirits have the power to protect people from temporary troubles, such as diseases and fears, or to grant minor wishes, is also uncertain. None of these objects of worldly refuge are considered to be supreme. In these cases, both the object of refuge and the motivation of the people going for refuge is worldly. This does not constitute Buddhist refuge. If one goes for refuge to the three jewels with worldly thoughts and motivation, then one is using the three jewels as a worldly refuge. A worldly motivation is the wish to attain wealth, longevity, health, beauty, a happy marriage and the like in this life and the next. If that is one’s motivation for taking refuge in the three jewels, although one might be a Buddhist, one’s refuge is the lowest kind of Buddhist refuge as the motivation is worldly.
Four ways of going for refuge can be distinguished: 1) going for refuge to a worldly refuge object with a worldly motivation; 2) going for refuge to a Buddhist refuge object with a worldly motivation; 3) going for refuge to a worldly refuge object with a Buddhist motivation; and 4) going for refuge to a Buddhist refuge object with a Buddhist motivation.

The first is not a Buddhist refuge at all. The second and third can be considered lesser varieties of Buddhist refuge, while the fourth is the actual Buddhist refuge. If the object of refuge is the three jewels, if the person who goes for refuge has accepted and committed himself to them, and if the motivation of going for refuge is either a Hinayāna or Mahāyāna motivation, then that is a proper Buddhist refuge.

Text section 156:

In the Hinayāna tradition, Buddha Shakyamuni is called the supreme among humans [rkaṅ gnyis mams kyi mchog] and is considered to be the supreme nirmāṇakāya [mchog gi sprul sku]. The Buddha’s mind is the dharmakāya [chos sku] and his body the rūpakāya [gzung sku]. These two kayas constitute the Buddha. The rūpakāya includes the sanbhogakāya and the nirmāṇakāya.

In the Hinayāna tradition, dharma is called the sublime dharma, peaceful and supreme, free from craving [zhi ba ‘dod chags dang bral ba mams kyi mchog dam pa’i chos]. The dharma here describes the mind of an arhat. ‘Peaceful’ refers to his peaceful mind. ‘Free from craving’ means that his mind is free from all afflictions such as desire [‘dod chags], anger [zhe sding], ignorance [gti mug], pride [nga rgyal] and jealousy [phrag dog]. An arhat is free from the obscuration of afflictions but not free from the obscuration of cognition. He still is not totally free from fixations [‘dzin pa med pa]. The arhat has realized that there is no truly existing ‘self’ [nga], but he still holds the view that phenomena have a real basis in indivisible particles [rdul phran cha med bden ‘dzin pa] and moments of consciousness [nang shes skad cig cha med bden ‘dzin pa], which he holds to be truly existent. His view, his realization, his thoughts, and his insight are the dharma in the Hinayāna refuge. The realizations abiding in the mind of an arhat constitute the dharma in the Hinayāna system. The dharma is not an external entity.

The dharma is nirvāna [myang ‘das] or cessation [’gog pa], the overcoming [spang bya] of all that should be overcome, namely all afflictions together with their seeds [sa bon]. Afflictions are the five mind poisons: 1) craving [‘dod chags], 2) aggression [zhe sding], 3) ignorance [gti mug], 4) pride [nga rgyal], and 5) jealousy [phrag dog]. The seeds or causes for all afflictions are the clinging to an ‘T’ [bdag du ‘dzin pa]. Once the five afflictions are overcome, one has reached nirvāna or cessation. Nirvāna means having transcended all suffering, its causes and fruition. Cessation means that clinging to an ego [bdag du ‘dzin pa] has ceased and, therefore, that afflictions have come to an end.
Realization in which ego-clinging and afflictions are absent is called the dharma. The mind of any person who is free of ego-clinging and afflictions can be called ‘dharma’. Likewise, a mind in which suffering and the origination of suffering have ceased is called dharma.

In the Hinayāna tradition, the sangha is called the supreme among gatherings [tshogs rnam kyi mchog]. ‘Gathering’ [tshogs] means ‘to gather many’ [mang po ‘dus pa]. Sometimes the sangha is called ‘the precious group of gatherings’ ['dus sde rin po che]. It does not refer to the gathering of a group of people, but to the realization [rtogs pa] that was previously absent from someone’s mind but has now been newly gathered [gsar du ‘dus pa’i rtogs pa].

What is newly gathered is the knowledge that realizes egolessness, the absence of a personal identity [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab], the truth of the path [lam bden]. That realization and the mind of the person who holds it cannot be separated. The person and the realization are not one because the realization of egolessness is newly acquired. This is a dualistic concept ['du shes]. Once this realization is born in the practitioner’s mind, however, it cannot be separated from him. Yet, the person and his realization of egolessness are two [tha dad], not one [gcig ma red]. The inseparability of the realization and the mind of the realizer is called ‘the supreme among all gatherings’. That is the sangha.

Though the Sanskrit word sangha actually means ‘gathering’, the Tibetan term translates as ‘those who aspire to virtue or goodness’ [dge ‘dun]. Monks do nothing other than aspire to goodness, train in goodness [dge ba la ‘jug pa], and act in virtuous ways. They have entered into virtue [dge ba la ‘jug]; they aspire to virtue; and they transform themselves into virtue [dge ba la ‘gyur]. A monk who has become an arhat has no thoughts other than virtuous thoughts.

Again, the Sanskrit word ‘sangha’ does not refer to the supreme group of people. All ordinary gatherings eventually fall apart, split or disperse. Therefore, they cannot be considered ‘supreme gatherings’. The realization of egolessness and the mind of the person who has realized it, however, do not fall apart, and, therefore, this kind of gathering is called the supreme among gatherings.

In the Hinayāna tradition, all three—Buddha, dharma and sangha—refer to the mind. One does not go for refuge to the Buddha’s body in the Hinayāna tradition.

The Hinayāna tradition recognizes four levels of realization. The first three are the ‘stream-enterer’ [rgyun zhugs], the ‘once-returner’ [phyir ‘ong ba] and the ‘non-returner’ [phyir mi ‘ong ba]. Among the five paths they are still on the path of learning [slob lam]. The fourth is the arhat, the ‘one who has destroyed his adversary’ [dgra boom pa]. An ordinary person [so so skye bo] is a ‘person who has not reached the path of the noble ones’ ['phags lam ma thob pa’i gang zag]. In the Hinayāna tradition [theg dman gyi mthong lam thob pa], a practitioner who has attained the ‘path of seeing’ has become a ‘stream-enterer’, and is then called ‘a noble one’ ['phags pa]. In the Mahāyāna tradition, the path of seeing is identical with attaining the first bodhisattva level. From the first level onward bodhisattvas are called ‘noble beings’.

The term ‘noble sangha’ ['phags pa’i dge ‘dun] refers to any person who has attained the higher realizations from the level of a stream-enterer onward. Those monks who have received ordination but have not yet reached any of these higher realizations are called ‘the sangha of the ordinary beings’ [so so skye bo’i dge ‘dun]. Both the noble sangha and the ordinary sangha are considered to be a ‘field of qualities’ [yon tan gyi zhung] and ‘a field or merit’ [bsod nams kyi zhung]. They are worthy of prostrations and offerings. A minimum of four monks constitutes an ordinary sangha.

There is a great difference between the Hinayāna and Mahāyāna levels of attainment. A Hinayāna practitioner never aspires to the enlightenment of the Buddha but only to become an arhat. Hinayāna practitioners believe that becoming an arhat is the highest attainment possible. From the Mahāyāna perspective, although an arhat can remain in a state of cessation for aeons, eventually he will be struck by a beam of light emitted from a buddha and will awaken from his state of cessation in order to progress along the bodhisattva path, beginning from the path of accumulations.

Hinayāna practitioners go for refuge to the three jewels with the motivation of liberating themselves from the fears and suffering of samsara. They want to be free from ego-clinging [bdag ‘dzin], recognizing that samsara comes about through egoclinging.

Without ego-clinging there is no samsara. The Buddha taught how to examine our situation so we can understand that the ego does not exist in actuality, and the belief in the existence of the ego is as absurd as believing in the horns of a rabbit.

Hinayāna practitioners take refuge to the three jewels for as long as they are alive or until they have reached the goal of their path, which is to become an arhat. Unlike the bodhisattva practitioners, they do not aspire to become buddhas. They think the attainment of complete enlightenment is virtually impossible, because it takes too many aeons of practice to become a buddha. They believe that becoming an arhat and leaving the load of samsara behind is much easier. Therefore, the Hinayāna tradition teaches only how to become an arhat and not how to become a completely enlightened Buddha.
Text section 158:

In Mahāyāna refuge, the practitioner develops a strong and unbearable compassion toward all sentient beings, who are as many in number as space is vast. ‘Unbearable’ [shas mi bzod pa] means ‘unbearable in the flesh’, like being pierced by a thorn. A Mahāyāna practitioner does not limit himself to only feeling compassion, but cultivates the thought, “I need to liberate all beings from all types of suffering.”

Without being liberated oneself, one cannot possibly lead beings to complete enlightenment. In order to liberate oneself and all beings from the fears and suffering of sansāric existence and peaceful nirvāna, one goes for refuge to the three jewels of Mahāyāna until attaining the essence of enlightenment [byang chub snying po]. The expression ‘essence of enlightenment’ refers to the attainment of the three kayas, dharmakāya, sanbhogakāya and nirmānakāya.

Text section 160:

The phrase, the fears of samsara and nirvāna [srid zhi’i ‘jigs pa] refers to the two extremes: the three realms of samsara and peaceful nirvāna [srid pa kham gsum ‘khor ba dang zhi ba mya ngan las ‘das pa’i mtha’]. What kind of fear exists in peaceful nirvāna? Even though the arhat is free from ego-clinging [gang zag gi bdag ’dzin], subject fixation, and has attained the peace of nirvāna, he still retains subtle fixations on phenomena [chos kyi bdog ’dzin], object fixations, which cause subtle fear and suffering. Bodhisattvas also have this subtle fixation. Therefore, the Mahāyāna practitioner aspires to free all beings from even the most subtle fixations. Existence [srid pa] refers to the ‘three realms of samsara’ [srid pa kham gsum ‘khor ba], and peace [zhi ba] refers to ‘peaceful nirvāna’ [zhi ba mya ngan las ‘das pa].

The three jewels which have manifested in the minds of others [gzan rgyud la byon zin pa] refers to the external three jewels [phyi rol gyi dkon mchog gsum], which have appeared in the perception of others [gzan sams can rgyud la phebs tshar ba]. The Buddha, dharma and sangha have manifested in this world and are still externally present. In Hinayāna the three jewels are regarded as something that exists outside the individual, whereas in Mahāyāna the three jewels exist internally, within the mind of the individual.

The ‘causal refuge’ [rgyu skyabs] entails acknowledging the three jewels as something existing outside of oneself. One considers the Buddha as the teacher of the path [lam ston pa po], the dharma as the path [lam], and the sangha as the companions along the path [lam progs]. The followers of the causal refuge see the three jewels in this way. They accept only the Buddha as the teacher because they believe that only the Buddha has truly overcome suffering and reached ultimate happiness. They believe that the Buddha alone has discovered and traversed the true path to enlightenment. They believe that the path taught by the Buddha is the true path. They accept this path as their personal path and commit to accomplish it, and they consider the sangha as their companions along this path. They consider the sangha as virtuous friends [dge ba’i grogs po] who help them increase their own virtue. Having this three-fold certainty [nges shes gsum] in Buddha, dharma and sangha is called the causal refuge.

Our teacher, Buddha Shakyamuni, first developed bodhicitta in a former aeon and gathered the accumulations of wisdom and merit during three countless aeons. Finally he was born as the son of King Suddhodana and attained complete enlightenment under the Bodhi Tree. The Buddha as the embodiment of the three or the four kayas is called the jewel of the Buddha [sangs rgyas dkon mchog]. The Buddha manifests as someone different from oneself. All statues of the Buddha are only his representations or substitutes [tshab] and should not be considered to be the real Buddha.

The dharma consists of the ‘wisdom of statements’ and the ‘wisdom of realization’ that dwells in the minds of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. Together they are called the jewel of the sublime dharma [dam chos dkon mchog].

The teachings of statements [lung gi chos] refers to the tripiṭaka, the three baskets [sde snod gsum]. They are the vinaya piṭaka, the basket of discipline [dul ba’i sde snod]; the sūtra piṭaka, the basket of discourses [mdo sde’i sde snod]; and the abhidharma piṭaka, the basket of the doctrine [mgon pa’i sde snod].

The teachings of statements can also be divided into the twelve sections of scriptures [gsung rab yan lag bcu gnyis]. The wisdom of statements that knows the statements of the three baskets [lung sde snod gsum ha go ba’i ye shes]. The wisdom of these three baskets is within the mind of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas who have the knowledge of having realized the teachings of the three baskets [lung sde snod gsum rtogs pa’i shes rab].

The ‘teachings of realization’ [rtogs pa’ichos] refers to the three precious trainings [bslab pa rin po che nam pa gsum], which are the training in discipline [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa], the training in samādhi [ting nge ’dzin gyi bslab pa], and the training in knowledge [shes rab kyi bslab pa]. The wisdom of realization is the wisdom that comes from the practice of the three trainings [rtogs pa bslab pa gsum nyams len byed pa’i ye shes]. All the buddhas and bodhisattvas train in discipline, samādhi and hold knowledge in their minds.

In that way, one should understand that the sublime dharma is the wisdom of statements and realization dwelling in the minds of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. The dharma is the mind that has realized wisdom. The Buddhist books and scriptures are the representation of or substitute [tshab] for the sublime dharma. They are not the real dharma.

The sangha of the bodhisattvas such as Mañjushrī and Maitreya, who have reached the level of non-returners [phyir mi idog pa], is called the jewel of the sangha [dge 'dun dkon mchog]. Here, the word non-returner refers to those bodhisattvas who cannot fall back into samsara. All bodhisattvas, from the first to the tenth level, are the main objects of refuge. All bodhisattvas who have not attained the level of a non-returner, the first bodhisattva level, are the minor objects of refuge. They are the sangha of ordinary beings [so so skye bo'i dge 'dun], who are the representatives of or the substitutes [tshab] for the noble sangha ['phags pa'i dge 'dun]. They are not the real sangha.

Our teacher, Buddha Shakyamuni, started out as a completely ordinary being. He took many rebirths as a good as well as a bad person. Once, due to his negative actions, he took rebirth in the hell realms, where he and another person were forced to pull a wagon. This wagon could barely be pulled by two people, much less by just one. Watching the demon overlord beating his companion and seeing his suffering, the future Buddha thought to himself, “This is hopeless. If I pull a little harder, perhaps it will alleviate his suffering.” Immediately the henchman of hell said, “Every being is experiencing here the fruition of his own karma. How can you even think that you might be able to help him?” Then the demon smashed Shakyamuni’s head with a hammer and he died. This was the first bodhisattva-like thought Buddha ever had as an ordinary being.

He took rebirth as the son of a potter and received the name Prabhāsa.120 At that time a perfectly enlightened buddha with the name ‘Great Shakyamuni’ had appeared in this world. The child Prabhāsa went to meet this buddha and offered him five cowrie shells ['gron bu inga], a pair of shoes [mchil lham zung gcig], an umbrella made of fine Benares cloth [ras kā shi ka],121 and a pot of fired clay [rdza bum so btang ba] filled with water. When he looked at this buddha he saw that Great Shakyamuni was perfect in every aspect. His body, voice, mind, and entourage, everything about him was very appealing and magnetized the young boy. Looking at Great Shakyamuni the boy could not detect the slightest defect. Merely being close to him generated instant joy and bliss. The boy thought, “I am so impressed by the Buddha, I should make an aspiration to become like him.”

Lord Buddha, just like your body,
Lifespan, size, realm of activities,
Just like your noble and supreme marks,
May I and all beings become exactly like you.

khyed kyi mtshan mchog bzang po ci ’dra ba de ‘dra kho nar bdag sogs ’gyur bar shog

With great devotion he made this aspiration. Then the Buddha placed his right hand on the boy’s head, saying, “May you attain enlightenment as the perfectly enlightened buddha in a future aeon in this ‘world system of endurance’ [mi m Juventus ‘jig rten gyi kham, skr. sahalokadhātu], in the ‘era of strife’ [rtsod Idan dus; skr. kaliyuga], at a time when the five degenerations [snyigs ma lnga] are ablaze, and may you bear the name of the glorious Shakyamuni.” Thus, Great Shakyamuni made a prediction [lun bstan]. That aspiration was the first aspiration that our teacher Buddha Shakyamuni ever made. Based on this aspiration and based on the blessings and prediction of the Buddha called the ‘Great Shakyamuni’, our Buddha actually became exactly like him and was also called by his name. That story describes the beginning of Buddha Shakyamuni’s bodhisattva activity.

Later on, at the time of a buddha called Buddha Ratnagarbha, he took rebirth as the Brāhmaṇa Samudrarenu.123 In front of Buddha Ratnagarbha he made five hundred great aspirations, praying that he would become enlightened in the impure realm of Sahalokadhātu, in the Kaliyuga, the age of strife, at a time when the five degenerations were ablaze. No other bodhisattva had ever made such aspirations since they perceived beings in the impure realms to be improper vessels for the teachings.

This quote from the third chapter of Sūtralankāra, the chapter on refuge, is difficult to understand. These words describing the resultant refuge ['bras skyabs] are considered words of tantra [rgyud kyi tshig]: Understand that because this (person) wishes (to obtain in himself) the real (three jewels), his very acceptance is (born) out of compassion and love ['di ni de dngos ‘dod pas khas len de yang sning rje dang brtse las rig bya].

The meaning of this statement is: “Understand that because the person wishes to obtain the ‘real’ three jewels, he accepts them or goes for refuge to them. But his very going for refuge arises or is born from compassion and love” [gang zag ‘di ni dkon mchog gsum po de dngos ma rang nyid thob ’dod pas khas len pa’am skyabs su ‘gro bar byed gi yod red / skyabs su ‘gro ba de yang sning rje dang brtse ba las byung ba’am skyes par rig par bya’o].

The word this ['di ni] refers to ‘this bodhisattva’ [byang chub sms pa’ ‘di ni] or ‘this person’ [gangzag ‘di ni]. The real [de dngos] means ‘the real essence of the Tathāgata’ [de bzhin nyid kyi dngos po] or ‘the real essence of thatness’ [de kho na nyid kyi dngos po] and connotes ‘the ultimate three jewels’ [mthar thug gi dkon mchog gsum] or ‘the real three jewels’ [dkon mchog gsum ngo ma], ‘the essence of the three jewels’ [dkon mchog gsum po’i ngo bo], the ‘actual Buddha’ [sangs rgyas ngo ma], the ‘dharmakāya of the Buddha’ [sangs rgyas kyi cho sku].

Because he wishes [‘dod pas] means ‘because he has the wish to obtain in himself’ [rang nyid thob ‘dod pas]. A bodhisattva wishes to actualize in himself the three jewels, the 122 The degeneration of time [dus kyi snyigs], the degeneration of sentient beings [sems can gyi snyigs ma], the degeneration of lifespan [tshe’i snyigs ma], the degeneration of actions [las kyi snyigs ma], and the degeneration of afflictions [nyon mongs pa’i snyigs ma]. Sometimes the ‘degeneration of views’ [lta ba’i snyigs ma] is listed in place of the ‘degeneration of actions’.

123 bram ze rgya mtsho’i rdul

dharmakāya of the Buddha [sangs rgyas kyi schos sku de rang nyid mgon du ‘gyur ba’i ‘dod pa]. The word ‘acceptance’ in the phrase his very acceptance [khas len de yang] means ‘his going for refuge in itself’ [skabs ‘gro de yang]. Out of compassion and love [snying brtse las] means that ‘the Mahāyāna refuge precepts are born out of compassion and love’ [theg chen gyi sdom pa de snying rje dang brtse ba las byung bar].

The bodhisattva goes for refuge to the three jewels because he is endowed with the thought to free all sentient beings from suffering. He is not motivated by the wish to achieve ultimate enlightenment for his own sake. Understand [rig bya] means ‘one must understand’ [ha go bar bya’o].

The ‘resultant refuge’, or the ‘fruitional refuge’ [‘bras skyabs], is the acceptance of the commitment, “With the wish to accomplish the real Buddha [sangs rgyas dngos ma], and the motivation to free all sentient beings from the fears and suffering of samsara through love and compassion, I will achieve complete enlightenment.” The resultant refuge is the commitment to accomplish in one’s own mind the three ultimate jewels in order to relieve all beings of the suffering of samsara and nirvāṇa, the commitment [dam bca’ ba] to actualize the three jewels in oneself.

Whereas in the ‘causal refuge’ [rgyu skyabs] the three jewels are considered as something external, different from oneself, in the ‘resultant refuge’ one knows the essence of one’s mind to be the buddha nature, the ultimate Buddha. The ‘resultant refuge’ is the commitment to acknowledge this fact for what it is [yin pa la yin par dam bca’ ba]. It is the thought, “I know that the essence of my mind is buddha nature, endowed with three aspects, empty essence [ngo bo stong pa], cognizant nature [rang bzhin gsal ba], and unrestricted responsiveness [thugs rje ‘gags med]. I will practice until I have completely realized this buddha nature.”

The hallmark [mtshan nyid] of the resultant refuge is committing to the fact that the fruition, the qualities of buddhahood, are already present in your mind. [‘bras bu sangs rgyas kyi yon tan de da lta rang rgyud la yod par dam bca’ ba]. You develop certainty about the fact that the fruition, the three kayas, is perfectly present within the essence of your mind, within your buddha nature. You make the firm resolve to accomplish and realize this buddha nature. In this way, the resultant refuge and the view [lta ba] are the same.

The ultimate [mthar thug pa] Buddha, dharma and sangha are the wisdom of inseparable knowledge [shes rab] and compassion [snying rje]. The ultimate, resultant refuge is committing oneself to accomplish that wisdom. This wisdom is identical with the essence of one’s mind, the buddha nature. Once one has accomplished the three jewels, one is free from the fears and suffering of samsara and nirvāṇa and has oneself become the ultimate refuge object.

The ultimate object of refuge is the Buddha himself. Within Buddha all three ultimate jewels are complete. The Buddha himself is the real ultimate Buddha. The mind of the Buddha is the dharma. That is the ultimate dharma. As the Buddha’s wisdom and the Buddha’s mind are inseparable, he is also the ‘supreme among gatherings’, the ultimate sangha.

The practitioner who understands this with acceptance, commitment and decisiveness, and who thinks, “I will accomplish the ultimate three jewels,” is practicing the ultimate refuge. This, the resultant refuge means commitment to the fruition [‘bras bu la dam bca’ ba], committing to become just like the Buddha, gaining the same realization.

The practitioner must also be motivated by love and compassion for all sentient beings, thinking, “In order to liberate all sentient beings I will attain enlightenment.” You must develop the heartfelt wish to liberate beings from all suffering of sansāric existence and peaceful nirvāṇa. You must understand that unless you reach the same realization as the Buddha, you will not be truly able to help all sentient beings. You need strong courage motivated by compassion.

The causal refuge does not enable one to liberate oneself and all beings from the suffering and fears of samsara and nirvāṇa because causal refuge does not incorporate the ultimate three jewels. Causal refuge is also called the ‘relative refuge’ or ‘outer refuge’. The resultant refuge covers the inner, secret and ultimate refuge.

Text section 164:

Let the three jewels constantly abide in your mind. Remember that the buddha nature is the ultimate state of happiness. Bring to mind that all sentient beings are naturally inclined toward happiness. This is because all sentient beings are endowed with the perfect buddha nature, the ultimate state of happiness, as the essence of their minds. This natural aspiration to happiness is a sign that beings are actually endowed with the buddha nature, although they are simply not aware of it.

Beings are confused about the causes that lead to happiness [bde ba'i rgyu]. Although beings want to be happy, to be free from suffering, they are unaware of the causes that lead to suffering. Suffering is the opposite of buddhahood, the state of perfect happiness. Suffering is temporary [glo bur ba] and is a state of delusion ['khrul pa]. Suffering is called samsara.

The Buddha is the condition for happiness [bde ba'i rkyen]. The cause for happiness [bde ba'i rgyu] is the dharma, and the support for happiness [bde ba'i grogs] is the sangha. Thus, one commits to the Buddha as the perfect teacher [lam ston mkhan] of the path to enlightenment, to the dharma as the perfect path ['gro lam] to enlightenment, and to the sangha as those whose minds are endowed with the dharma as the perfect support [grogs] while on the path to enlightenment.

Jigme Lingpa defines the Mahāyāna sangha as ‘all beings who are endowed with the genuine worldly view’ ['jig ten yang dag pa'i lta ba]. The genuine worldly view entails abandoning the ten non-virtuous actions and practicing the ten virtuous actions. It further entails taking the three jewels as one’s teacher and believing in karma, the law of cause and effect. Whoever accepts the Buddha as the condition for happiness, the dharma as the cause for happiness, and the sangha as the support for happiness is considered to have fulfilled the minimum requirement to be a member of the Mahāyāna sangha.

If you aspire to become the three jewels, you are practicing the resultant refuge. That aspiration by itself constitutes the resultant refuge. If you aspire to become the three jewels for the sake of all sentient beings, you are practicing bodhicitta. You have already expanded your mind beyond the confines of your own personal interests to the wider welfare of all sentient beings. Refuge by itself does not require this expansion, while bodhicitta is based on this very expansion.

Therefore, Atisha said that the resultant refuge of Mahāyāna has a twofold commitment: “I will establish all sentient beings on the level of enlightenment, and in order to do that I will attain complete enlightenment.” There is a commitment for one’s own benefit, to become the Buddha, and a commitment for the sake of others, to establish all beings on the level of the buddhahood.

The scriptures often define the bodhicitta of aspiration as the commitment to the fruition ['bras bu la dam bca' ba smon pa'i sems bskyed] and the bodhicitta of application as the commitment to the cause [rgyu la dam bca' ba 'jug pa sems bskyed]. One might wonder whether or not the resultant refuge ['bras skyabs] and the bodhicitta of aspiration [smon sems] are the same.
This issue was widely discussed by Indian and Tibetan scholars such as Acārya Sthiramati, a student of the great Indian scholar Acārya Vasubandhu, Lord Atisha and so on. Acārya Vasubandhu had four students who were superior to himself: Gunaprabha [yon tan 'od] was supreme in vinaya ['dul ba], Sthiramati [blo gro brtan pa] was supreme in abhidharma [mgon pa], Dignāga [phyogs kyi glang po] was supreme in pramāṇa [tshad ma], and Ārya Vimuktasena ['phags pa' mam grol sde] was supreme in prajñāpāramitā [sher phyin].

Text section 165:

Longchen Rabjam wrote that the difference between resultant refuge and bodhicitta of aspiration comes down to the difference between benefiting oneself and benefiting others. He said that the wish, “I go for refuge in order to attain perfect enlightenment” is refuge, while the wish, “I go for refuge in order to establish all sentient beings on the level of enlightenment” is bodhicitta. The former considers the benefit for oneself, and the latter considers the benefit for others. Mahāyāna refuge always needs to have the bodhicitta aspect of going for refuge, the motivation to take refuge for the sake of all sentient beings. If that aspect is lacking, one’s refuge becomes a Hinayāna refuge, “I go for refuge until I have attained enlightenment.”

Text sections 167-170:

Although you might not practice refuge according to the Hinayāna teachings, you should know the difference between the Hinayāna and the Mahāyāna style of going for refuge. They differ in motivation [bsam pa / kun slong], in time frame [dus], and in regard to the object of refuge [skyabs yul].

The Hinayāna practitioner takes refuge with the motivation, “In order to liberate myself from the fears of samsara and attain peaceful nirvāṇa I go for refuge until the end of this life.” Thus the vinaya literature explains. The time-span is “from today onwards until I die.”

The Hinayāna object of refuge [skabs yul] is the dharma of cessation ['gog pa'i chos], which brings about the Buddha and the sangha. It is the dharma of realization that dwells in the mind [thugs rogs pa'i chos] of the Buddha and in the mind of the sangha. This dharma is the object of refuge.

The ‘path of learning’ [slob pa'i lam] refers to the ‘stream-enterer’, the ‘once-returner’ and the ‘non-returner’. The path of ‘no-more-learning’ [mi slob pa'i lam] refers to the arhats and, on the highest level, to the Buddha. Nirvāṇa is the dharma of cessation ['gog pa'i chos], the truth of cessation ['gog bden]. Nirvāṇa is that which is beyond the truth of suffering and the truth of the origination of suffering. This dharma of cessation is the object of refuge.
The word nirvāṇa means ‘transcending suffering’ [myang ngan las ‘das pa]. ‘Suffering’ refers to the truth of suffering [sdug bsngal gyi bden pa] and the truth of origination [kun ‘byung gi bden pa]. That which is beyond suffering and the origination of suffering is called nirvāṇa, ‘transcending suffering’.

Vasubandhu describes the objects of refuge for the followers of the Hinayāna in his Abhidharma-kośa-kārikā:

Whoever goes for refuge to the three (jewels)
Goes for refuge to the dharma of no-more-learning which brings forth the Buddha, and
To the dharma of both learning and (no-more-learning), which brings forth the sangha,
(Thus) to nirvāṇa, (to the truth of cessation alone).

Whoever [gang zhig] means ‘whoever the sentient beings may be’ [sems can gang zhig].
Goes for refuge to the three [gsum la skyabs su ‘gro ba] means ‘goes for refuge to the three jewels’ [dkon mchog gsum].

How does a Hinayāna practitioner perceive the Buddha? He perceives the Buddha to be a product of the path of no-more-learning [mi slob pa’i lam], the ultimate truth of the path [lam bden mthar thug pa]. Therefore, refuge in the Buddha is going for refuge to the dharma of no-more-learning, which brings forth the Buddha [sangs rgyas byed pa’i chos mi slob pa].

The Hinayāna practitioner considers the Buddha’s mind to be endowed with the ultimate truth of the path [lam bden mthar thug pa]. The ultimate truth of the path is that which has brought all of Buddha’s formerly existing afflictions to an end [snga yod gyi nyon mongs pa thams cad zad pa] and which keeps all afflictions from ever rising up again [slar mi skye bar shes pa’i lam bden mthar thug pa].

The Hinayāna practitioner does not go for refuge to the body of the Buddha [sangs rgyas kyi gzugs sku] because he does not see any difference between the Buddha’s body before his enlightenment, when he was still an ordinary being [so skye] and after his enlightenment, when he was a perfectly enlightened buddha.

How does a Hinayāna practitioner perceive the sangha? He perceives the sangha to be the product of both the path of learning and the path of no-more-learning, which are both the dharma. Therefore, refuge in the sangha is going for refuge to the dharma of both learning and no-more-learning, which bring forth the sangha [dge ‘dun du byed pa’i chos slob mi slob gnyis ka].
A Hinayāna practitioner considers the minds of the sangha members to be endowed with the truth of the path. The truth of the path is nothing other than the ‘wisdom that realizes egolessness’ [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab]. This realization is dwelling in the mind of the Buddha and in the minds of the members of the noble sangha. This truth of the path is the object of refuge.

How does a Hinayāna practitioner perceive the dharma? He perceives the dharma to be nirvāṇa [mya ngan ‘das pa], the truth of cessation alone [’gog bden gcig pu]. That is his only refuge. Refuge to the dharma is going for refuge to the truth of cessation, to nirvāṇa.

The body of the Buddha is considered a residual, an empty shell that is subject to the truth of suffering [sdug bsgal bden pa’i lhag ma]. Buddha as King Siddhārtha’s son with the name Siddhārtha [don grub] is regarded as an ordinary being [so so’i skye bo] who lived a worldly life, was married and had a child. Then he renounced his worldly life and perfected all five paths in one night, sitting on his seat in front of the Bodhi Tree, becoming the completely enlightened Buddha. Since he still had the same karma-produced body of the former Prince Siddhārtha, his body is regarded as the body of an ordinary being and is not an object of refuge. The Buddha, as the object of refuge, is the realization [rtogs pa] of the truth of the path of no-more-learning, which dwells in the Buddha’s mind.

The bodies of the sangha members are also considered residuals, empty shells subject to the truth of suffering. The sangha, as the object of refuge, is the realization of the path of learning and the path of no-more-learning, which dwells in the minds of the sangha.

The dharma, as the object of refuge, is the truth of cessation, free from all desire, identical with nirvāṇa, the overcoming of all obscurations—all of which dwells in the minds of the Buddha and the sangha. But note that only the Buddha himself has overcome all obscurations, the obscuration of afflictions [nyon sgrib] and the obscuration of cognition [shes sgrib]. The sangha members have overcome only the obscuration of afflictions. This describes the three jewels in the Hinayāna tradition.

Taking refuge in the Buddha in the Hinayāna tradition means to take refuge in the wisdom dwelling in his mind—the realization of the truth of the path [thugs la yod pa’i lam bden rtogs pa’i ye shes]. Taking refuge in the dharma means to take refuge in the dharma of cessation. Taking refuge in the sangha means to take refuge in the minds of the sangha members who have realized the wisdom of egolessness, the truth of the path [lam bden bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab].

Text section 171 / stanza 26:
In the Mahāyāna tradition, one should practice going for refuge with the following motivation, which differs from that of a Hinayāna practitioner: “In order to place all sentient beings, equal in number to the farthest reaches of space, on the level of perfect enlightenment, from now until the attainment of the ‘essence of enlightenment’ [byang chub snying po], I go for refuge to the Buddha, the embodiment of the four kayas and five wisdoms [sku bzhi ye shes lnga'i bdag nyid]. I go for refuge to the sublime dharma, the embodiment of the statements and realizations [lung dang rtogs pa'i bdag nyid], and I go for refuge to the gathering of the noble sangha of bodhisattvas.”

The phrase equal to the reaches of space [nam mkha' dang mnyam pa] in these lines of refuge has a very extraordinary significance. The extension of space cannot be fathomed by the mind. Space has no center or periphery. “All beings, as many as exist throughout the reaches of space…” is a phrase that does not appear in any other religious tradition. Going for refuge on such a vast scale cannot be practiced by smallminded people, but is the practice of those who follow the Mahāyāna teachings.

The essence of awakening [byang chub snying po] means the very core, the buddha nature [bde gshegs snying po]. The dualistic mind is like a husk [shun pa], composed of karma [las] and afflictions [nyon rmongs pa], which covers the enlightened essence. The terms ‘essence of awakening’ [byang chub snying po], ‘buddha essence’ [sangs rgyas kyi snying po], and ‘buddha nature’ [bde gshegs snying po] all refer to the same enlightened state. This very state is the essence of your mind. It is nothing other than your own awareness wisdom [rang rig pa'i ye shes]. Once your own awareness wisdom has been actualized [mgon du gyur ba], which means stabilized [brtan pa thob pa], then enlightenment is achieved. There is no enlightenment apart from awareness, buddha nature [rig pa bde gshegs snying po].

The phrase until I attain the essence of awakening124 or ‘until I arrive at the essence of awakening’ [byang chub snying po mchis kyi bar / slebs kyi bar du] means ‘until I have attained stability in awareness wisdom, the essence of awakening’ or ‘until I have attained buddhahood’ [sangs rgyas ma thob gyi bar du]. Do not harbor any concepts about buddha nature. Any statement you make about it can only be relative. The absolute is not within the reach of the intellect [don dam blo yi spyod yul min].

Text section 172:

124 Nyingmapa School of Tibetan Buddhism, endnote 110: “The Point of Enlightenment (byang chub snying po; skr. bodhinanda) refers to the outer place and time at which Shakyamuni and other buddhas attained manifest enlightenment, i.e. Vajrāsana, the Indestructible Seat, at Bodhgaya; to the inner Point of Enlightenment which is the Akaniṣṭha realm; and to the secret Point of Enlightenment which is the buddha-body of indestructible reality (vajrakāya).”
Going for refuge in the Hinayāna and Mahāyāna traditions also differ in terms of timespan [dus kyi khyad pa]. In the Mahāyāna tradition one does not go for refuge merely until the end of one’s life but until the attainment of enlightenment.

Text sections 173-174:

The 26th stanza of the Bodhicharyavatara states: “I go for refuge to the buddhas until I attain the essence of awakening” [byang chub snying bar]. Khenpo Kunpal gives a commentary on the phrase essence of awakening.

All buddhas of this fortunate aeon [bhadra kalpa] will attain enlightenment under the royal bodhi tree [byang chub shing dbang] in Bodhgayā. The bodhi tree is also called the ‘royal bodhi tree’ [byang chub shing gi rgyal po] and ‘essence of awakening’ [byang chub snying po]. Thus, the phrase essence of awakening can be understood as the name of the bodhi tree under which Buddha Shakyamuni attained enlightenment, as well as the place where the buddhas of this Fortunate Aeon attain enlightenment.

The various buddhas that appeared in different aeons or different realms have all attained enlightenment under their own personal bodhi trees. The tree is a symbol for solitude [dben pa’i rtags]. The buddhas attain enlightenment by meditating alone in a forest, not by practicing within a city. The Buddha Amitabha sat in front of the bodhi tree called Illuminating Jewel Lotus [rin chen pad mo rnam par snyang byed].

Just as all buddhas of the three times attain enlightenment under a bodhi tree, on an outer level one goes for refuge until one has also attained complete enlightenment under a bodhi tree. This marks the time-span for going for refuge to the three jewels on an outer level. One sits in the vajra-like samādhi until one has reached complete enlightenment.

On an inner level the time-span for going for refuge to the three jewels is marked by sitting in the vajra-like samādhi until one has completely realized awareness, the natural state of buddha nature. Once the natural state of buddha nature as it is has been realized, one has become enlightened.

Only the Buddha himself can perceive the dharmakāya as it really is. Even the noble beings, the arhats, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattvas and great bodhisattvas cannot see buddha nature in the same way as Buddha. Therefore, Maitreya said in the Uttaratantra:

Even the noble ones (cannot see the buddha nature),
Just as an infant cannot look at the shape of the sun from the house where it has just been born.
Buddha or buddha nature is wisdom, extremely subtle [shin tu phra ba], not the object of thoughts. Buddha is not within the reach of ‘worldly meditation’ [’jig rten pa’i bsgom pa]. Dualistic consciousness [rnam shes] can never perceive buddha nature as it really is [gnas lugs ji lta ba bzhin du]. A newborn infant, whose eyes are too sensitive to bear the light of the sun, lacks the capacity to look at the sun itself. Likewise, not even noble beings who dwell on any of the ten bodhisattva levels can see the dharmakāya as the Buddha can, since bodhisattvas on the tenth level still have not overcome all obscurations of cognition [shes sgrib] and therefore have not actualized [mgon du ma gyur ba] non-dual wisdom [gnyis su med pa’i ye shes]. Bodhisattvas and yogins have partial glimpses of dharmakāya [chos sku’i cha shas], but not the unhindered outlook of the Buddha.

Text section 175-177:

The understanding of the extraordinary three jewels in the Mahāyāna tradition differs from the interpretation of the three jewels in the Hinayāna tradition. Concerning the distinction of the object [yul gyi khyad pa] of going for refuge, the special qualities of Buddha, dharma and sangha according to Mahāyāna, Maitreya’s Uttara Tantra describes the qualities of the Buddha in the following manner:

(1) Uncompounded, (2) spontaneously present,
(3) Not realized through external conditions,
Endowed with (4) knowledge, (5) love and (6) power—

Such is the Buddha, endowed with the hallmark of twofold benefit.

‘dus ma byas shing lhun gyis grub gzhan gyi rkyen gyis rtogs min pa mkhyen dang brtse dang nus par ldan don gnyis ldan pas sangs rgyas nyid

This Mahāyāna description of the qualities of the Buddha is divided into two sets. The qualities of the first set pertain to those that are of perfect benefit to oneself [rang don phun sum tshogs pa], which means the qualities that benefit the Buddha for himself [sangs rgyas kho rang la yod pa’i yon tan]. The qualities of the second set pertain to those that are of perfect benefit to others [gzhan don phun sum tshogs pa], the qualities of the Buddha that are directed to other people [gzhan la bltos pa’i yon tan]. The first set consists of three qualities: uncompounded, spontaneously present, and not realized through external conditions.
(1) Uncompounded ['dus ma byas] refers to the aspect of the empty essence [ngo bo stong pa'i cha] of buddha nature. It is primordial emptiness. The empty essence is not compounded or newly created by causes and conditions [rgyu rkyen gys 'dus ma byad pa]. If something is newly created, it must be impermanent [mi rtog pa], conditioned, belonging to the skandha of formation ['du byed], defiling [zad pa], subject to suffering, and deceptive [btsug ba can]. This is exactly what Buddha or buddha nature is not.

(2) Spontaneously present [ lhun gys grub pa] refers to the aspect of the cognizant nature [rang bzhin gsal ba'i cha] of buddha nature. All qualities of buddha nature come from this cognizant aspect. All qualities are primordial and spontaneously present [yon tan thams cad ye nas lhun gys grub pa]. 'Qualities' refers to the qualities of body [sku], voice [gsung], mind [thugs], qualities [yon], and activities [phrin las]. They do not need to be created or made up, and they do not come about as something new [gsar du 'byung ba ma dge].

These two aspects—uncompounded and spontaneously present—are the real Buddha, the real wisdom [ye shes], the true buddha nature. The words Buddha [sangs rgyas] and wisdom [ye shes] are synonymous. Milarepa said, “The Buddha himself is wisdom. There is no Buddha other than wisdom [sangs rgyas nyid ye shes yin gyi ye shes las gzhan du 'gyur ba'i sang rgyas med].” All qualities of the Buddha are nothing other than wisdom. Buddha’s body, speech and mind are nothing other than wisdom, wisdom that is uncompounded and spontaneously present.

(3) Not realized through external conditions [gzhan gyi rkyen gys rtags min pa]. This wisdom cannot be realized through the vehicles that rely on striving [rtsol bcas kyi theg pa], but only through the effortless and self-existing Great Perfection itself. Buddha nature is beyond the reach of words and thoughts. It is inconceivable and inexpressible, something that can only be realized by ‘one’s own individual awareness wisdom’ [so sor rang rig pa'i ye shes]. This wisdom is in oneself and can only be realized by oneself.

These three—uncompounded, spontaneously present, and not realized through external conditions—are the ‘three perfect qualities that benefit oneself’ [rang don gyi yon tan phun sum tshogs pa gsum], the first set of qualities.

The second set of qualities consists of the three qualities that bestow perfect benefits on others. Of these, the first is (4) knowledge [mkhyen pa]. Buddha’s knowledge is twofold: a) the knowledge of the natural state [ji lta ba mkhyen pa], which is total realization of the absolute natural state [don dam gyi gnas lugs], and b) the knowledge of all there is to know [ji rnyed pa mkhyen pa], which is knowledge of all relative phenomena [kun rdzob gyi chos], i.e., omniscience. This is the knowledge of everything from all aspects [kun nas kun tu mkhyen pa]. It includes every field of knowledge [shes bya], everything from front to back, from inside out, from the most refined to the most gross levels. It is all-knowing and all-seeing simultaneously from every aspect and direction. Buddha can simultaneously see the body of a person from all sides. At the same time he knows every atom in the person’s body down to the most refined level. He knows everything about the person’s countless lifetimes down to the most minute detail. Buddha knows everything directly [mgon sum], not indirectly or through deduction [rjes dpag].

The second quality benefiting other beings is (5) love [brtse ba]. Buddha’s love extends to all sentient beings. His love does not increase for special people nor does it diminish for inferior beings. His love for all beings is utterly impartial and unconditional. Compared to Buddha’s love, the love a mother has for her child is very small. Buddha’s love is free from concepts [dmigs pa med pa’i brtse ba]. Since an ordinary being is still involved in concepts, if he somehow had true love for all sentient beings like the Buddha does, he would be unable to bear it. If an ordinary person saw the suffering of the world as the Buddha does, that person would collapse and die. Only when emptiness is realized can one bear such love and knowledge.

Ordinary beings are protected by their ignorance from really knowing the suffering of others. When one has truly recognized the natural state, the essence of one’s mind, then non-conceptual love and compassion for all sentient beings will naturally shine forth.

The third quality benefiting other beings is (6) power [nus pa]. Buddha’s knowledge, compassion and power all manifest from his realization of the natural state. The Buddha has the power to manifest his qualities in the perception of others so that he can be seen, heard, touched and met. These infinite qualities of body, voice, mind, qualities and activities appear in the perception of others. This power to manifest the three kayas externally is the actual emanation [sprul sku] of the Buddha.

The Buddha has the power to benefit whoever sees his body, hears his voice or thinks of him. Even meeting his relics in stūpas, or visiting places where he lived have tremendous benefits. The word ‘power’ [nus pa] also connotes ‘activity’ [phrin las], his unceasing activities on behalf of all sentient beings. Power also means that the Buddha is endowed with the methods [thabs] to truly overcome all afflictions and all suffering. That is why he is called the ‘unexcelled precious teacher’ [ston pa bla med rin po che]. These three—knowledge, love, and power—are the ‘three perfect qualities for others’ [gzhan don gyi yon tan phun sum tshogs pa gsum].

These are the six main qualities of the Buddha. If one adds the benefit for oneself and the benefit for others, one can count eight. The basic distinction [dbye gzhis] made in regard to Buddha’s qualities is between the two sets of qualities, those that benefit oneself and those that benefit others. Thus, the benefiting qualities of the Buddha are divided into six subdivisions [dbye ba'i ya gyal du byas pas]. The Indian way of counting results in a total of eight qualities, because ‘benefit to oneself’ and ‘benefit to others’ are counted as two additional qualities. To us this seems as bizarre as counting the five fingers plus the hand to get six.

These eight qualities are the hallmark of a buddha. The Buddha is described as the Buddha endowed with the eight qualities [yon tan brgyad ldan gyi sangs rgyas]. The Buddha is also described as being endowed with three or four kayas. The three kayas are dharmakāya, sanbhogakāya and nirmānakāya. The fourth kaya is the svabhāvikakāya, the unity of all three kayas.

The dharmakāya is perceived by the Buddha alone, the sanbhogakāya is perceived by the bodhisattvas, and the nirmānakāya appears to those with impure perception. According to one explanation [bshad stangs], only those bodhisattvas who dwell on the tenth level are able to perceive the sanbhogakāya, while according to another explanation, the sanbhogakāya is perceived by all bodhisattvas, from the first level onward until the tenth, each to a different degree.

Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations 233

The special qualities of the dharma according to Maitreya’s Uttara Tantra are the following:

(1) Inconceivable, (2) without two, (3) non-conceptual,
(4) Pure, (5) luminous and (6) having remedial power—
That which is and that which frees one from craving
Is the dharma, endowed with the hallmark of the two truths.

The dharma is called the ‘dharma of realization, endowed with eight qualities’ [yon tan brgyad ldan rtogs pa’i chos]. These qualities are divided into two sets. The first set consists of the three qualities of the truth of cessation [’gog pa’i yon tan gsum], and the second set consists of the three qualities of the truth of the path [lam gyi yon tan gsum].

These six qualities plus the names of each set add up by the same unique style of counting to the eight qualities of the dharma.
First, let us examine the truth of cessation. Among the four noble truths, the truth of cessation and the truth of the path are called the dharma. The truth of suffering and the truth of origination are what must be overcome or rejected [spang bya]. It is taught,

“Suffering should be understood [ha go bar bya], but origination should be overcome [spang bar bya].”

Identifying suffering and understanding its nature is crucial. The ‘origination’ of suffering is karma and afflictions [las dang nyon mongs pa]. Moreover, the very cause of karma is afflictions. The very cause of afflictions is ego-clinging [bdag ‘dzin]. The method [thabs] to overcome the origination of suffering is the truth of the path, and the result of having overcome the origination of suffering is the truth of cessation.

When one takes refuge in the dharma, one is taking refuge in the ‘truth of cessation’ and the ‘truth of the path’, but not in the ‘truth of suffering’ or in the ‘truth of origination’. The truth of suffering and its origination are things to overcome [spang bya], not objects of refuge. While suffering and the origination of suffering are not the actual dharma, they become dharma once they have been overcome.

Cessation is free from craving, which is based in dualistic fixation. All afflictions such as desire [‘dod chags], anger [zhe sdang], ignorance [gti mug], pride [nga rgyal] and jealousy [phrag dog] result from dualistic fixation or attachment. That which brings one to non-attachment or cessation is the path.

The dharma is the truth of cessation and the truth of the path. There are three wisdom qualities belonging to the truth of cessation and three wisdom qualities belonging to the truth of the path. Through the three wisdom qualities of the path, the three wisdom qualities of cessation are realized.

The first of the three qualities of cessation is the aspect of being (1) inconceivable [bsam med] because cessation cannot be penetrated by thoughts [bsam gys mi khyab pa]. The dharma of cessation is beyond concepts [blo ‘das], inconceivable [ma bsam] and inexpressible [brjod med]. The truth of cessation cannot be reached by intellect. As Shantideva said:

Since the ultimate is not within the reach of intellect,
The intellect must be described as the relative.
don dam blo yi spyod yul min
blo ni kun rdzob yin par brjod

The second quality of cessation is the aspect of being (2) without two [gnyis med], meaning that the truth of cessation is without karma and afflictions [las dang nyon mongs pa med pa]. Cessation is without fixations and obscurations. Both the obscuration of afflictions and the obscuration of cognition are absent. As dualistic fixation or ego-clinging is absent, karma and afflictions are also absent.

The third quality of cessation is the aspect of being (3) non-conceptual [rtog med], meaning it is without thoughts. The truth of cessation is not an object of any of the 84,000 kinds of thoughts. Within cessation, all thoughts—subtle and gross—are pacified [nam rtog phra rags thams cad zhi ba]. These three—unconceivable, without two, and non-conceptual—are the three qualities of the truth of cessation ['gog bden gi yon tan].

The truth of cessation is realized through the truth of the path. The three qualities belonging to the truth of the path [lam gden gi yon tan] are: (4) pure, (5) luminous, and (6) having remedial power. Here, these three qualities are explained in reverse order. (6) Having remedial power [gnyen po] means that the dharma, from the first bodhisattva level until enlightenment, is the remedy for all afflictions [nyon mongs pa gnyen por gyur ba]. This is the remedial power of the dharma. The remedy to all that should be overcome is called the ‘path without obstacles’ [bar chad med lam]. What needs to be overcome are the obscuration of afflictions and the obscuration of cognition. The overcoming of the obscuration of afflictions is the attainment of the first bhumi, the first bodhisattva level. Once one has overcome what must be overcome, one has entered into the ‘path of liberation’ [nam gro lam]. This is the aspect of liberation [gro ba’i cha] after the obscuration of afflictions has been overcome. From that point forward the path becomes increasingly clear—luminous and pure.

(5) Luminous [gsal ba] means that once all stains are purified, wisdom perception arises luminously [ye shes kyi snang ba gsal ba]. Wisdom perception is the capacity to understand and perceive everything with utter clarity. Like the sun, it illuminates all. This is the power of the dharma’s luminosity.

(4) Pure [dag pa] means to ‘be purified of temporary stains’ [blo bur gi dri ma dag]. From the first bodhisattva level until the tenth, stains remain to be purified along the path.

Once one has entered into the ‘path of special progress’ [kyad par du ‘gro ba’i lam], one gradually progresses higher and higher. The higher one progresses along the path, the fewer stains remain to be purified. Only the Buddha is stainless or totally pure of all obscurations. This is the power of the dharma’s purity.

Based on these three wisdom qualities of the path [lam gyi ye shes gsum], the three-fold wisdom of cessation will arise ['gog pa’i ye shes gsum]. The three qualities of the truth of cessation, the three qualities of the truth of the path, plus the two truths themselves are counted as the eight qualities of the dharma.

There are three kinds of cessation: the cessation of the arhats, the cessation of the bodhisattvas, and the cessation of the Buddha.

The cessation of the Buddha is utterly pure [dag pa], free from temporary stains. Its wisdom perception is luminous [ye shes kyi snang ba gsal ba]. It is the extraordinary knowledge and wisdom of the Buddha. It is having remedial power [gnyen po] for all afflictions.

That which frees one from craving [gang gis chags bral ba] refers to the abovementioned three wisdom qualities of the path: pure, luminous, and having remedial power. That which is free from craving [gang zhid chags bral ba] refers to the three wisdom qualities of cessation: inconceivable, without two, and non-conceptual.

That which is free from craving [chags pa dang bral ba] is called cessation. Craving [chags pa] is the craving of afflictions [nyon mongs pa'i chags pa] or the craving of dualistic fixations [bzung 'dzin gnyis kyi chags pa]. Craving includes the obscurations of afflictions and of cognition. Cessation is free from all craving.

The dharma has the hallmark of the two truths [bden gnyis mtshan nyid can de chos]: the truth of the path and the truth of cessation. That is the definition of the dharma. Because the truth of cessation cannot be penetrated by thoughts, it is (1) inconceivable [bsam gylis mi khyab pa]. Because it is the absence of karma and afflictions [las dang nyon mongs pa med pa], it is (2) without two [gnyis med]. Because all thoughts are pacified, it is (3) non-conceptual [rtog med pa]. These are the three ultimate qualities of cessation (1-3), that which is free from craving [gang zhid 'dod chags dang bral ba].

Cessation is attained through that which frees one from craving [gang gis 'dod chags dang bral ba]. This refers to the three wisdom qualities of the path: (4) pure [dag pa], (5) luminous [gsal ba], and (6) having remedial power [gnyen po]. Stated simply, through the path which frees one from craving, one arrives at cessation, which is free from craving. This is the ‘dharma of realization’ [rtogs pa'i chos], endowed with eight qualities and possessing the hallmark of the two truths.

Text section 180:

The truth of cessation [gog bden] is the overcoming of afflictions [nyon mongs pa spong ba'i bral cha]. It is the absence of afflictions [nyon mongs pa med pa'i cha]. Since cessation is the mere absence of afflictions according to the tradition of the shrāvakas, one might ask whether or not the truth of cessation can still be classified under the dharma of realization [rtogs pa'i chos]. One would expect that the attainment of cessation would bring about ‘a newly born realization that was previously not present’ [sngar med gsar du skyes pa'i rtogs pa]. But no newly born realization is mentioned; instead only the absence of afflictions is mentioned. As the cessation of the shrāvaka is described as the ceasing of all activities of mind and mental patterns [sems dang sems byung thams cad kyi rgyu ba ’gag pa], how can there be any realization?

To clarify this issue, Khenpo Kunpal explains that cessation is the the outcome [bzhag pa] or the result of having realized the truth of the path [lam bden rto gs pa’i lag rjes]. Therefore, through the truth of the path [lam bden gya] one achieves the expanse free from craving [chags pa dang bral ba’i dbyings gang zhig], which is an expanse or emptiness inseparable from wisdom. This expanse is called ‘cessation’ within the context of Mahāyāna.

This emptiness or expanse is inseparable from wisdom. The real cessation is ‘not just mere emptiness’ [stong pa stong kyang ma yin pa]. It is the unity of emptiness [stong pa nyid] and wisdom [ye shes]. This is the heart of the teachings of the Old School [rnying ma pa]. The ‘expanse of absolute truth’ [chos kyi dbyings] and the ‘wisdom of the expanse of absolute truth’ [chos kyi dbyings kyi ye shes] are inseparable. That is called cessation, and is therefore classified under the ‘dharma of realization’.

Generally, the ultimate truth of cessation is called the ‘expanse dharmakāya’ [’gog bden mthar thug dbyings chos sku]. The ultimate truth of the path is called the ‘wisdom dharmakāya’ [lam bden mthar thug ye shes chos sku]. One cannot separate the expanse from the wisdom; they are inseparable.

The followers of the Gelukpa school state that the expanse and the wisdom are separate, that they are different, while the viewpoint of the Nyingma School is: “Expanse and wisdom are inseparable [dbyings dang ye shes tha dad med pa].” This is a very important point. The iconography of the Nyingma School expresses this unity of expanse and wisdom as Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri in union. Cessation and path are the ‘dharma of realization’ [rto gs pa’i chos].

Text section 181:

The dharma of statements [lung gi chos] refers to the tripiṭaka [sde snod gsum]: the vinaya piṭaka [’dul ba’i sde snod], the sūtra piṭaka [mdo sde’i sde snod], and the abhidharma piṭaka [mgon pa’i sde snod]. It can also be divided into the twelve sections of scriptures [gsung rab yan lag bcu gnyis].

The ‘wisdom of statements’ is the wisdom that knows the statements of the tripiṭaka [lung sde snod gsum ha go ba’i ye shes]. The wisdom of the tripiṭaka is within the minds of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas who hold the knowledge of having realized the teachings of the tripiṭaka [lung sde snod gsum rto gs pa’i shes rab].
The dharma of realization [rtogs pa’i chos] refers to the three precious trainings [bslab pa rin po che rnam pa gsum]: the training in discipline [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa], the training in samādhi [ting ne ‘dzin gyi bslab pa], and the training in knowledge [shes rab kyi bslab pa].

The ‘wisdom of realization’ is the wisdom that comes from practicing the three trainings [rtogs pa bslab pa gsum nyams len byed pa’i ye shes]. All the buddhas and bodhisattvas train in discipline and samādhi and hold knowledge in their minds. In that way, one should understand that the sublime dharma is the wisdom of statements and the wisdom of realization in the minds of the Buddha and the bodhisattvas. The ‘real’ dharma is the mind that has realized this wisdom. The Buddhist books and scriptures are the representations of or substitutes [tshab] for the sublime dharma. They are not the real dharma.

 Accord with [rgyu mthun pa] has the same meaning as ‘to be of the same kind’ [rigs mthun pa] or ‘to be beneficial to’ [phan ‘dogs pa], just as wood is beneficial to fire whereas water is not.

Text sections 182-184:

The sangha [dge ‘dun] are the noble ones of the Mahāyāna who have attained the level of non-returners, all those who have attained the first bodhisattva level and will not fall back into samsara. The Mahāyāna sangha are the special friends of a practitioner who goes for refuge, because they will accompany the practitioner until enlightenment.

The shrāvakas arhats and the pratyekabuddha arhats are counted as noble sangha, but they do not belong to the Mahāyāna sangha as they can lead the practitioner only to the level of an arhat, not to complete enlightenment like the bodhisattvas do. The bodhisattvas lead the practitioner from the smaller path of accumulation [tshogs lam chung nga] up to the level of complete enlightenment. The Hinayāna sangha are considered the ‘close friends’ [nye ba’i grogs po] of the practitioners while the bodhisattvas are considered the ‘most intimate friends’ [shin tu nye ba’i grogs po]. The arhats do not aspire to attain enlightenment; their goal is the level of Hinayāna cessation. They accompany the practitioner only part of the way.

Maitreya defines the hallmarks of the sangha in the Uttara Tantra:

(1) As it is, (2) all there is, and (3) the inner—

These are wisdom perceptions. When (obscurations) are purified (4,5,6),
The wise belong to the gathering of non-returners
And are thus endowed with unexcelled qualities.
ji lta ji snyed nang gi ni ye shes gzigs pa dag pas na blo ldan phyir mi ldog pa'i tshogs bla med yon tan dang ldan nyid

The eight qualities of knowledge and liberation are the hallmark of the sangha [rig grol yon tan brgyad dge 'dun 'phags pa'i mshan nyid]. The sangha are those who dwell on the path. They possess the three qualities of knowledge [rig pa'i yon tan gsum] and the three qualities of liberation [grol ba'i yon tan gsum].

The three qualities of knowledge are the three kinds of wisdom: (1) the wisdom that knows the natural state as it is [ji lta ba mkhyen pa'i ye shes], (2) the wisdom that sees all there is [ji snyed pa mkhyen pa'i ye shes], and (3) one's individual and distinct inner awareness wisdom [nang so so rang rig pa'i ye shes]. These three are called wisdom perception [ye shes gzigs pa] or the three qualities of knowledge—as it is, all there is, and inner awareness wisdom. In this verse Maitreya lists only the qualities of knowledge but not the qualities of liberation, which will be explained below.

The non-returners [phyir mi ldog pa] in this context are the bodhisattvas from the first level onward, those who do not fall back into samsara. They are called the wise [blo dang ldan pa], those who are endowed with wisdom.

A bodhisattva of the first level directly [mgon sum] realizes the natural state, the buddha nature. Thus, he recognizes (1) the wisdom of knowing the natural state as it is [ji lta ba mkhyen pa'i ye shes / rig pa], but his wisdom perception is still obscured. He sees the moon directly, but not clearly. In the same way, the bodhisattva has recognized the buddha nature directly, but not clearly. His wisdom perception sees that the buddha nature is present in all sentient beings. He knows directly that all beings, without exception, are endowed with buddha nature. Therefore, he knows that all beings have the potential to attain perfect enlightenment. Consequently, the wish to liberate all beings from their non-recognition of the buddha nature and to lead them to complete enlightenment naturally arises in his mind.

A bodhisattva sees that the empty essence of buddha nature is endowed with knowledge [shes rab] and wisdom [ye shes]. He perceives that the cognizant nature of the buddha nature is endowed with love [brtse ba] and compassion [snying rje]. He knows that the all-encompassing responsiveness [thugs rje kun khyab] of buddha nature is endowed with the potential to attain liberation and enlightenment. Therefore, he knows that all beings have the buddha qualities of knowledge [mkhyen pa], love [brtse ba] and capacity [nus pa] primordially present within their buddha nature.

A bodhisattva is also endowed with (2) the wisdom that knows all there is to know [ji snyed mkhyen pa'i ye shes / rig pa]. A limited aspect of this knowledge arises with the first bodhisattva level and increases from there on. A completely enlightened buddha has unlimited, total omniscience. To the extent that the bodhisattva has recognized the natural state as it is, he will perceive the buddha nature in others. He truly and directly sees it present in all beings and knows that it is the same buddha nature in all beings, free from all distinctions. This is the true source of the bodhisattvas’s non-conceptual compassion [dmigs pa med pa’i snying rje]. Due to this insight, the bodhisattva can never forsake any being. Until one has reached that level of insight, one’s practice of compassion remains contrived and conceptual. As the bodhisattva progresses on the path through the levels, he gradually attains ultimate omniscience. The omniscience of the Buddha is infinite. He knows everything that exists throughout the three times. (3) One’s individual and distinct inner awareness wisdom [nang so so rang rig pa’i ye shes / rig pa] is the non-duality [gnyis su med pa] of the wisdom of knowing the natural state as it is and the wisdom that knows all there is to know. At that level the bodhisattva perceives that his own buddha nature and the buddha nature in all sentient beings are identical, are a non-duality [gnyis su med pa], without any difference [tha dad med pa]. He understands the non-duality of the relative and the absolute, the indivisibility of samsara and nirvāṇa and so on.

Individual and distinct [so so rang] means that one must realize buddha nature by oneself for oneself. ‘Individual’ has the connotation of alone, single [gcig pu]. One’s own individual and distinct awareness wisdom [so so rang rig pa’i ye shes] is the wisdom that recognizes one’s personal and individual mind essence. This concludes the explanation of the three qualities of knowledge: (1) as it is, (2) all there is, and (3) inner. Khenpo Pendze defines the phrase individual and distinct awareness wisdom [so so rang rig pa’i ye shes] in the following way: “Since it is not mingled with anything, it is individual. Since it is unmistakable about the essence of all objects, it is distinct. Awareness has the connotation of seeing. Since it is a knowledge that exists from the very beginning, it is wisdom, primordial knowledge.”

Awareness wisdom does not mingle with anything and is therefore ‘individual’ and not common [thun mong ma yin pa]. Awareness wisdom perceives the essence of ‘all objects’, all phenomena that exist. It perceives them ‘distinctly’ and ‘unmistakenly’ both through the knowledge of the natural state as it is and through the knowledge of all there is to know. Awareness wisdom clearly ‘sees’, knows and perceives everything. It is a ‘knowledge’ or wakefulness [shes pa] that is not newly acquired, a knowledge that is ‘primordially’ the very essence of each being’s mind. This primordial knowledge, with which all sentient beings are endowed, can only be known by itself, by its individual and distinct awareness wisdom, and never through thought. When the obscurations of afflictions and cognition are cleared away, the realization of individual distinct awareness wisdom dawns naturally.

Now, to continue with the explanation of the three qualities of liberation, which are liberation from (4) the obscuration of attachment [chags sgrib], (5) the obscuration of cognitive limits [thogs sgrib], and (6) the obscuration of inferior motivation [dman sgrib].

Therefore, Maitreya says in the verse when (obscurations) are purified [dag pas na], implying liberation from these three obscurations.
126 gzhan dang ma’dres pas na so so / yul de dag gi ngo bo ma nor ba la rang / rig pa ni mthong ba’i don no / ye nas gnas pa’i shes pa yin pas na ye shes so.

Once the bodhisattva is liberated from the obscuration of afflictions [nyon mong gi sgrib pa], he is liberated from the obscuration of attachment. The obscuration of attachment means to be attached to whatever it may be, to have fixations ['dzin pa]. Once the bodhisattva is liberated from the obscuration of cognition [shes bya’i sgrib pa], he is liberated from cognitive limits. Then his knowledge is no longer obscured, that is to say, he is free from the obscuration of knowledge [mkhyen pa’i sgrib pa]. Everything will be clear and vividly known in his mind. His knowledge is unhindered and without limits.

Once the bodhisattva is freed from attachment to egotistic ideas [rang ’dod yid byed kyi zhen pa], he is liberated from the obscuration of inferior motivation [blo dman pa’i sgrib pa]. The inferior motivation to practice for his own sake collapses. To the extent egoclinging decreases, inferior motivation decreases.

The three qualities of liberation are also listed as liberation from: (4) the obscuration of afflictions [nyon mong gi sgrib], (5) the obscuration of cognition [shes bya’i sgrib pa], and (6) the obscuration of meditative absorptions [snyoms ’jug gi sgrib pa]. The obscuration of afflictions pertains to desire ['dod chags], anger [zhe sDang], ignorance [gti mug], pride [nga rgyal] and jealousy [phrag dog]. The obscuration of cognition refers to dualistic fixations, which obscure the genuine recognition of buddha nature. The obscuration of meditative absorptions refers to the obscurations of samadhi [bsam gtan gi sgrib pa / ting nge ‘dzin gi sgrib pa] that arise as long as the bodhisattva has not perfected his meditation skills [rtsal ma rdzogs].

Concerning the definition of sangha, the basic distinctions [dbyar gzhi] are knowledge [rig pa] and liberation [grol ba]. Each of these two sets has three subdivisions, which are the three qualities of knowledge and the three qualities of liberation. The three qualities of knowledge and the three qualities of liberation plus the two categories of knowledge and liberation themselves, are counted as the eight qualities of the sangha [rig grol yon tan bBrugyad].

Since Buddha, dharma and sangha are each endowed with eight qualities, one can say that the three jewels of Mahāyāna are endowed with twenty-four qualities. As it is said:
Being endowed with eight qualities of the twofold benefits is the hallmark of the jewel of the Buddha.

Being endowed with eight qualities of cessation and path is the hallmark of the sublime dharma.

Being endowed with eight qualities of knowledge and liberation is the hallmark of the noble sangha.

Text section 185:

The incomparable teacher is the Buddha. Teacher means the teacher of the path [lam ston pa po]. The incomparable protection is the dharma, protecting against all suffering [sdug bsngal las skyobs pa po]. The incomparable guide is the sangha, those who guide themselves and others to the higher levels.

Text sections 186-187:

Although for a beginner the dharma is the real refuge, the ultimate refuge is still Buddha himself, because the disciple wants to reach the same level as the Buddha. The dharma gives the beginner the actual means and methods to overcome suffering. Simply praying to the Buddha is not sufficient for liberation. The dharma must be practiced as it is the method that will take the disciple to enlightenment.

Buddha does not have the power to wash away the negative deeds or wipe off the defilements of beings with his hands. Nor does he have the power to transfer his wisdom realization to other people, thus granting them instant enlightenment. Rather he taught both the natural state, the ultimate peace, the buddha nature and the methods for practicing the path that leads to the realization of this wisdom. When students follow the Buddha’s instructions they themselves will attain liberation and enlightenment.

Text section 188:

If one practices the sublime dharma, one protects oneself from the suffering of samsara and the lower realms. Even someone who merely keeps the ‘eight precepts observed for one day’ [bsnyen gnas kyi sdom pa brgyad]127 has temporarily protected his mind from mistakes [nyes pa]128 and thus will take rebirth in the realm of the gods in his next life. The sublime dharma is so powerful that even limited practice brings about significant results. Therefore, the incomparable sublime dharma is the actual refuge for the beginner. The two other objects of refuge, Buddha and sangha, do not have the power to protect the beginner right away.

The eight precepts observed for one day are very important for all upāsakas, lay practitioners. Simply keeping these eight precepts is already the practice of dharma. A lay practitioner should keep these precepts regularly on either the full or new moon days. There are many lay practitioners who keep these eight precepts once or twice a month.

127 The eight precepts observed for one day are: 1) not to kill [srog gcod pa]; 2) not to steal [ma byin par len]; 3) not to have sexual intercourse [mi tshangs par spyod pa]; 4) not to lie [rdzun du smra ba]; 5) not to take intoxicating beverages [myos par ‘gyur pa’i chang]; 6) not to dance [gar], listen to or play songs [glu] or music [rol mo], and not to wear ornaments [rgyan], garlands [phreng ba] or perfumes [spos nyug]; 7) not to sleep on a high or large bed [khri stan che mtho]; and 8) not to eat after midday [dus ma yin pa’i kha zus].

128 Entry into dictionary: nyes ltung / nyes pa’i ltung ba / ngan song la ltung ba’i nyes pa – a mistake through which one falls into the three lower realms

Buddhist lay practitioners can take different kinds of precepts depending on their ability. One can distinguish six kinds of lay practitioners [dge bsnyen drug]:

1) A lay practitioner who decides that he exclusively commits to the three jewels as his refuge and embraces the refuge precepts obtains the status of an ‘upāsaka, one who takes the three jewels as his refuge’ [skyabs gsum ‘dzin pa’i dge bsnyen].

2) If a lay practitioner decides that the abandonment of killing is the only precept he is able to maintain, then, by embracing this precept, he obtains the status of an ‘upāsaka who holds one commitment’ [sna gcig spyod pa’i dge bsnyen].

3) If a lay practitioner decides that the abandonment of killing and of taking what has not been given are the only precepts he is able to maintain, then, by embracing these precepts, he obtains the status of an ‘upāsaka who holds two commitments’ [sna ‘ga’ spyod pa’i dge bsnyen].

4) If a lay practitioner decides that the abandonment of killing, of taking what has not been given, and of speaking lies are the only precepts he is able to maintain, then, by embracing these precepts, he obtains the status of an ‘upāsaka who holds most (of the five) commitments’ [phal cher spyod pa’i dge bsnyen].

5) If a lay practitioner decides that the abandonment of killing, of taking what has not been given, of speaking lies, of sexual misconduct, and of consuming intoxicants are the precepts he is able to maintain, then, by embracing these precepts, he obtains the status of a ‘complete upāsaka’ [yongs rdzogs dge bsnyen].
6) If a lay practitioner decides that the abandonment of killing, of taking what has not been given, of speaking lies, of all sexual intercourse and of consuming intoxicants are the precepts he is able to maintain, then, by embracing these precepts, he obtains the status of an ‘upāsaka of pure conduct’ [tshangs spyod dge bsmyen].

Text sections 189-192:

The objects of refuge are considered differently in sūtra and tantra. In the sūtra tradition the refuge objects are Buddha, dharma and sangha. From the perspective of tantra these are called the ‘outer refuge’ [phyi'i skyabs ’gro]. In addition, tantra teaches the inner, secret and absolute aspects of the same refuge objects. These four aspects of refuge become increasingly profound, with the more profound aspect always incorporating the less profound.

The ‘inner refuge’ [nang gi skyabs ’gro] in the tantra tradition is guru, yidam and dākinī. The guru is one’s personal teacher from whom one has received empowerments [dbang], reading transmissions [lun], and oral instructions [khrid]. The ultimate guru, the root guru, is the master through whom one has recognized the essence of one’s mind [sems ngo], one’s buddha nature, beyond any doubt. In tantra practice it is essential to view one’s root guru as identical with the Buddha.

The yidam is the meditation deity with whom one has connection from former lifetimes. The yidam meditation deity represents the dharma. The dākinī is a female buddha and represents the sangha, since the dākinī supports the practitioner on the path to enlightenment. Guru, yidam and dākinī are called the ‘three roots’ [rtsa ba gsum]. The guru is the root of blessing [byin rabs kyi rtsa ba bia ma]; the yidam is the root of accomplishments [dngos grub gyi rtsa ba yi dam]; and the dākinī is the ‘root which dispels all obstacles’ [bar chad thams cad sel ba'i rtsa ba mkha' 'gro], also referred to as the ‘root of activities’ [phrin las kyi rtsa ba].

The ‘secret refuge’ [gsang ba'i skyabs 'gro] includes the nādis (channels), pranas (energies) and bindus (essences). In their impure aspect, nādis, pranas and bindus constitute the physical human body. In their pure aspect they constitute the subtle body of the three kayas. In their pure aspect the nādis are the nirmānakāya, the pranas are the sanbhogakāya, and the bindus are the dharmakāya. Although nādis, pranas and bindus are in essence primordially pure [ngo bo ye dag], they are temporarily obscured through ignorance and delusion, appearing to us as our impure body, speech and mind. Through tantric practices, the yogin purifies them of temporary obscurations [glo bur bral dag] and thus achieves the three kayas.

The absolute refuge [don dam pa'i skyabs 'gro] is the three kayas—dharmakāya, sanbhogakāya and nirmānakāya. These three kayas are viewed as three aspects of the buddha nature. The unborn empty essence [ngo bo stong pa] of buddha nature is the dharmakāya. The cognizant nature [rang bzhin gsal ba] of buddha nature is the sanbhogakāya, and the unified responsiveness [thugs rje zung ’jug] of buddha nature, the unity of the empty essence and the cognizant nature, is the nirmānakāya.

The meditation experience of the empty essence is an experience of non-thought [mi rtog pa’i nyams]. The meditation experience of the cognizant nature is an experience of clarity [gsal ba’i nyams], and the meditation experience of the responsiveness is an experience of bliss [bde ba’i nyams]. Thus, in the tradition of the Old School of Secret

Mantra [gsang sngags rnying ma], the refuge objects may be nādi, prana and bindu [rtsa rlung thig le], referring to the secret refuge. The refuge objects may also be bliss, clarity and non-thought [bde gsal mi rtog pa], or essence, nature and responsiveness [ngo bo rang bzhin thugs rje], both of which refer to the absolute refuge of the three kayas. Intending to purify the nadis, pranas and bindus of one’s body, one commits to the goal to achieve their pure aspect, the three kayas, and practices relevant yogic techniques that will result in the three kayas. The refuge commitment to nādi, prana and bindu is: “I will practice that which primordially has the nature of the three kayas exactly as it is” [ye nas sku gsum gyi rang bzhin yin pa la yin par gso gi yin].

Without knowing the difference between refuge and supplication, taking refuge to nādi, prana and bindu has no meaning. Refuge to the nādi means, “I commit to accomplish the pure aspect of the nadis, which is the nirmānakāya.” But if one confuses refuge with a supplication and supplicates nādi, prana and bindu by saying, “Nādi, prana and bindu, please protect me,” then one has completely missed the point. It is pointless to put one’s hope in nādi, prana and bindu.

All three—Buddha, dharma and sangha—are the objects of refuge. Among them the dharma is the most important object of refuge for the beginner because it is the dharma that will change his mind. The objective of a follower of Buddha is to reach enlightenment, and only the practice of the dharma leads to enlightenment. Neither the Buddha nor the sangha can make you enlightened. You can attain enlightenment only by following the dharma, the path taught by the Buddha. But the final goal is to become the same as the Buddha, to reach enlightenment. Therefore, the Buddha is not the main refuge for a beginner, but the ultimate refuge. For as long as one is still on the path of learning, one is called a beginner. Reaching the path of no-more-learning [mi slob pa’i lam], one is no longer a beginner.

While a beginner can both take refuge in and supplicate Buddha and sangha, the dharma cannot be supplicated; it must be practiced. Taking refuge in the dharma really means making the commitment: “I not only intend to practice; I promise that I will practice the dharma”. When one practices according to this commitment, one’s dharma practice will be successful. Since it is only through the methods of the dharma that a beginner can reach enlightenment, a beginner must apply the dharma to his own mind with the commitment to really practice and integrate the teachings. This is a very important point to understand. Taking refuge in the dharma means committing one’s mind to increase knowledge and compassion.

Only the practice of dharma can change one’s mind. Only through the practice of the dharma can the beginner embark on the path to enlightenment. The Buddha cannot confer his realization to the beginner. A personal effort to practice the dharma is necessary.

Many people object to the secret refuge objects of the Old School because they do not know the difference between going for refuge and making a supplication. A practitioner of the Old School might be asked, “How can you go for refuge to nadi, prana and bindu? That is absurd. How can bliss, clarity and non-thought grant you protection and refuge? What nonsense!” A practitioner of the Old School who cannot answer such criticism may become upset and start doubting his own practice. Such practitioners are ignorant, not knowing that refuge to nadi, prana and bindu means the commitment: ‘I commit to accomplish the pure aspects of nadi, prana and bindu, which are nirmānakāya, sanbhogakāya and dharmakāya.”

A story is told of a scholar called Akhu Dam Chö [a khu dam chos] who did not know the difference between refuge [skyabs ’gro] and supplication [gsol ‘debs]. He started out as a student of the Old School and then went to study for forty or fifty years with the Gelukpa School. He became an intellectual [rtog ge ba] and wrote a refutation129 of Mipham Rinpoché’s interpretation of the ninth chapter of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra and of Madhyamakālankāra-kārikā.130 As an old man, he stayed in retreat. He had practiced ‘peaceful abiding’ [zhi gnas] for a long time and would sometimes stay a few days withdrawn in absorption, neither moving his body nor eating any food. One day, while he was reciting the refuge prayer from the Longchen Nyingthig, he was startled by the lines of refuge which say:

To the essence of the three jewels, the Sugata; and to the three roots;
To bodhicitta, the nature of the nadi, pranas and bindus;
And to the mandala of essence, nature and capacity,
I go for refuge until (I reach) the heart of enlightenment.

He began to wonder, “How can my own nadi, prana and bindu be of any help to me? How can I take refuge in them?” He went to see Tertön Sogyal [gter ston bsod rgyal]. Tertön Sogyal was very surprised to see this old and famous scholar and asked him, “What brought you here?” Akhu Dam Chö said, “I have an important question to ask.

How can I go for refuge to my own nadi, prana and bindu?” Tertön Sögyal answered, “These lines of the refuge liturgy are classified as the ‘resultant refuge’ [bras skyabs], not as the ‘causal refuge’ [rgyu skyabs]. Don’t confuse refuge with supplication [gsol ’debs]! Understand that the essence of refuge is acceptance [khas len], commitment [dam bca’ ba] and resolve [thag chod pa]. When you practice that kind of refuge you make the commitment to accomplish the pure aspect of your nadis, pranas and bindus, which are the three kayas, nirmānakāya, sanbhogakāya and dhamakāya.” This story shows that sometimes even great scholars do not understand the meaning of refuge.

Text section 193:

Were someone to ask, “If dharma is the main refuge, then why are Buddha and sangha mentioned as refuge objects at all?” The answer to that question is that had the Buddha not appeared in this world, we would still dwell in ignorance, not even knowing the word ‘dharma’. But because Buddha did appear and perfectly taught to sentient beings the unfailing path [lam ma nor ba] that he himself had traversed, the Buddha, the teacher of the path, is a refuge object. The point here is that acceptance, commitment and certainty in one’s mind regarding the Buddha do not by themselves lead to enlightenment. One needs to enter into the path of the dharma. That is why the dharma is more important.

We, the beings of this degenerate age, lack the good fortune to have met the Buddha face to face but are instead guided on the genuine path to liberation by the sangha [dge ‘dun]. Therefore, the sangha, our companions along the path, are also a refuge object. The sangha consists of the representatives [tshab] of the Buddha. The sangha of teachers and spiritual friends guide us, sentient beings endowed with the five degenerations,131 on the genuine path to enlightenment.

Text section 194:

The way of going for refuge to the three jewels is to go for refuge to the Buddha as the teacher, to the dharma as the path, and to the sangha as the companions [dkon mchog gsum la ston pa lam grogs kyi tshul du skyabs su ‘gro dgos] along the path.

Our teacher is the perfect Buddha, the Enlightened One. Buddha is the one who has purified the two obscurations—the obscuration of afflictions and the obscuration of cognition—and has attained the realization of the twofold knowledge—the knowledge of the natural state and the knowledge of all there is to know. Because the Buddha is free from all biased views, he is the perfect teacher.

One is committed to Buddha as the teacher; one is committed to practice his teachings as he taught them. Do not accept teachers who teach biased or extreme views [mtha’ smra ba’i ston pa] as your personal teacher, and do not follow their teachings. Do not listen to non-dharma coming from those who uphold biased views, such as parents, relatives or friends. Non-dharma [chos min] means statements that are not in accord with the natural state of things [dngos po gnas lugs dang mi mthun pa’i chos]. Not listening to non-dharma means not following non-dharma. Of course, one can read, listen to and study all types of teachings from any spiritual path. Once having committed oneself to the dharma, however, one should follow only the path taught by the Buddha.

Tīrīkas [mu steags pa]132 are those who uphold biased views [mtha’ brten gi lta ba steags pa], those who take one of the four extremes as their path [mu bzhī la lam steags su bca’ ba]. The four extremes are: 1) the extreme of eternalism [rtag mtha’], 2) the extreme of nihilism [med mtha’], 3) the extreme of both existence and non-existence [yod med gnyis ka’i mtha’], and 4) the extreme of neither existence nor non-existence [yod med gnyis ka ma yin pa’i mtha’]. Those who believe in an eternal life after death are upholding the view of eternalism. Those who do not believe in karma, the law of cause and effect, who do not believe in previous or future lifetimes, are upholding the view of nihilism.

If a Buddhist practitioner well-versed in Buddhist philosophy and practice also engages in studies of the systems of the tīrīkas, his faith in Buddhism will become even firmer. As it is said:

131 The five degenerations are: the degeneration of time [dus kyi snyigs], the degeneration of sentient beings [sems can gyi snyigs ma], the degeneration of lifespan [tshe’i snyigs ma], the degeneration of actions [las kyi snyigs ma], and the degeneration of afflictions [nyon mongs pa’i snyigs ma]. Sometimes the ‘degeneration of views’ [lta ba’i snyigs ma] is listed in place of the ‘degeneration of actions’.
132 The Sanskrit word tīrīka is often translated as ‘heretic’, but tīrīka in fact refers to someone who is on a path other than the Buddhist one.

A dharma practitioner who has committed to practice the sublime dharma according to the instructions of the Buddha should abstain from negative worldly activities such as business [tshong], farming [so nams], fighting enemies [dgra ’dul], maintaining family [gnyen skyongs] and so forth. This statement is mainly meant for monks, nuns, yogins and yoginis. All Buddhist lay practitioners who are still involved in worldly activities, should at least maintain this as an aspiration.

If you lack the firm commitment to avoid worldly activities, the infectious influence of work, family, socializing, entertainment and so on will keep you away from genuine dharma practice. Recognizing the virtual impossibility of keeping dharma commitments one hundred percent, an authentic practitioner must at least maintain the proper aspiration, the goal being to ultimately separate himself completely from all worldly activities. A mind that lacks commitment easily becomes lost, blown about like a piece of paper in the wind. On the other hand, if a practitioner is too uptight about his commitments, he is in danger of becoming inflexible and hard in his mind. A beginning practitioner who attempts to commit to completely disengage from worldly activities will engage in them to a certain extent anyway because of the force of his habitual patterns. However, the basic commitment not to engage in worldly activities gives him direction.

Relatives, friends and acquaintances have a strong impact on one’s mind. Only through strong commitment and resolve to practice the dharma can a practitioner guard himself against this influence. Internally, a practitioner must guard himself against the habitual patterns of his own mind. Externally, he needs to guard himself from negative, non-dharmic influences.

The masters advise: “Neither fight enemies nor maintain friends” [dgra ’dul gnyen skyong ma byed]. Avoid getting caught up in hateful relationships. At the same time, do not become overly involved with relatives and friends. The golden rule is to be neither too friendly nor too unfriendly [ha cang mi mdza’ mi mthun gnyis ka ma byed]. Maintain an approach that does not give people a reason to like you or dislike you intensely.

Furthermore, do not be shrewd in business [tshong mkhas po ma byed], and as soon as you are able, stop doing business. Without a doubt, relatives, friends, enemies and business dealings distract practitioners the most.

Lay practitioners who are householders need a particularly strong commitment to dharma practice in order to eventually disentangle themselves from worldly activities. Maintain a strong commitment and resolve in your mind, and in daily life do the best you can. Take the best practitioners as your example, and make daily aspirations to become like them. Set your mind on practice in solitude like Milarepa. Resolve in your mind to practice like the Buddha and to become exactly like him. Strive for the best, for complete enlightenment, recognizing that your own habitual patterns will slow you down anyway.

A practitioner needs to think, “I will liberate all sentient beings from the suffering of samsara.” Although you recognize your lack of capacity—in the face of the enormity of the task—to free all sentient beings, you must still adhere to that commitment and resolve. Simply having that noble thought, the sincere bodhisattva attitude, already accumulates the same merit as actually accomplishing it. That is why one should take these great and noble thoughts and motivations very seriously. These thoughts have tremendous power and merit. Always keep the thought that you will attain complete enlightenment, that you actually will liberate all beings from their suffering, and that you will establish them on the level of supreme buddhahood. Having created that thought with true commitment and resolve, you gain the same merit as if you had actually completed this great task. Reciting the lines of bodhicitta aspiration just as mere lip-service to the tradition, not really thinking it is possible, has no benefit.

Heartfelt commitment and resolve are required.

At the time when King Prasenajid [gsal rgyal], the king of Kosala, had invited the Buddha and was preparing great offerings, a young beggar girl [bu mo dbul mo] who lived on alms offered a little bit of corn oil ['bru mar] in a potsherd [gyo dum] in which she had placed a wick. With utmost faith [dad pa bla na med pa] she offered prostrations to the Buddha and made following aspiration [smon lam]: "Through this root of virtue may I become exactly like our teacher, the Buddha, and become enlightened at a time when sentient beings only live up to a hundred years and may I be known as Shakyamuni. May I have students like the supreme Shariputra [sha ri’i bu], who is endowed with wisdom, and like the supreme Maudgalīyāna [maudgal gyi bu], who is endowed with magical powers. May I have an attendant like Ānanda [kun dga’ bo], a mother like Māyādevī [sgyu ‘phrul lha mo], and a son like Rāhula [sgra gcen ‘dzin]."

In the evening, Buddha’s attendant Ānanda came to extinguish the lamps. With a flick of his hand he extinguished them one by one. But when he came to the lamp of the beggar girl he could not put the flame out. Then he tried to blow the flame out with his fan [rlung yab], but that also did not work. He gathered all his breath to blow it out, but still failed. “This is strange,” he thought. He told the Buddha what happened and asked for an explanation. The Buddha replied, “Even a storm could not extinguish this lamp because this beggar girl made an aspiration to reach enlightenment, to become exactly like me, Buddha Shakyamuni.” It was reported that the beggar girl’s lamp burned for seven days, outshining all the other offerings.133

One goes for refuge to the noble sangha as companions, friends or guides along the path. When traveling through Tibet with a tour leader [sgar dpon], one follows his advice about where to camp, when to eat and so forth. He is the traveler’s companion and friend, leading him all the way to the destination. People and guides who are traveling to different destinations cannot be your companions; neither can those who are traveling only part of the way. They cannot serve as ultimate guides.

In the same way a practitioner should not fall under the influence of anyone, be it a spiritual or worldly person who causes him to be distracted by the eight worldly concerns [jig rten chos brgyad], which are: 1) gain [rnyed pa] and 2) loss [ma rnyed pa]; 3) fame [snyan] and 4) disrepute [mi snyan]; 5) praise [bstd pa] and 6) blame [smad pa]; and 7) pleasure [bde ba] and 8) pain [mi bde ba].

These eight points describe the egocentric goals and fears of worldly people. Pursuing these self-centered goals in action and thought, one is not following the teachings of the Buddha in a genuine way. A person who is motivated by personal gain, fame and so on is a worldly person, regardless of his appearance. Being motivated by the eight worldly concerns, one can never truly practice the Mahāyāna path.

A worldly person enjoys gaining wealth and is depressed by loss. The wealth he accumulates makes him happy, his major goal in life being riches and comfort. Only if one’s aspiration for wealth is motivated by the desire to help others does one qualify as a lay follower or bodhisattva of the Buddha’s teachings.

A worldly person desires fame and honor but is averse to disrepute. If a bodhisattva desires to reach a certain level of fame in order to help beings and disseminate the teachings of the Buddha on a broader scale, he still qualifies as a follower of the Buddha’s teachings.

A worldly person likes to be praised and hates to be blamed or criticized. If one aspires to be beautiful, rich, powerful and intelligent because one enjoys being praised, one is a totally worldly person and is leading an ultimately meaningless and pointless life.

Do not maintain close friendships with people who lead you into the eight worldly concerns. Do not have intimate conversations [kha], exchanging personal ideas [blo] with them. Do not imitate [gcig tu mi byed] any person involved in the eight worldly concerns in conversation, thinking or behavior [kha blo spyod gsum].

The good qualities of a person who falls under the influence of someone negative are liable to diminish. While an individual with positive qualities may have a slight beneficial influence on someone negative-minded, a beginning practitioner without sufficient stability is more likely to succumb to negative influences. When dealing with negative-minded people you must really watch your behavior, speech and mind. You need to have the firm resolve not to fall into negative habits due to the infectious influence of negative persons. As Gedün Chóphel once said:

Fools do not follow me
And I do not follow fools.
That is the foremost vow of the wise.
Even when my life is at stake, I will endeavor to keep it.

Furthermore, not even the shrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas qualify as ultimate companions [mthar phyin pa’i grogs po] on the path because they do not aspire to complete enlightenment. They are satisfied with the level of an arhat. They are friends along the path but not ultimate friends like the bodhisattvas. Follow the example and the life stories of the Buddha and great bodhisattvas and take them as your ultimate friends along the path to enlightenment.

In particular, take care not to associate yourself closely with anyone who tries to turn you away from the dharma. Any associate, acquaintance or friend who distracts you from learning and practicing the Buddha’s teachings is an ‘evil friend’ [bdud gyi grogs po]. You should strongly resolve to avoid such persons. An evil friend is not someone with horns on his head but someone who causes obstacles to your dharma practice. In the same manner, never interrupt another person’s dharma practice and do not dissuade others from practicing the dharma. Always try to respect other people’s practice time and space.

Merely knowing about going for refuge is not enough. A practitioner must receive the refuge precepts in the proper fashion from a qualified teacher. After receiving the precepts [sdom pa] he needs to maintain them through the trainings [bslab bya]. A practitioner should always keep these precepts in his heart.

The refuge precepts are maintained by observing the three sets of general precepts and the five special precepts. The three sets of general precepts are: the three precepts concerning prohibitions [dgag pa’i bslab bya gsum], the three precepts concerning
In detail, the three precepts concerning prohibitions are:

(1) Having gone for refuge to the Buddha, do not take sansāric gods as a permanent refuge and do not pay homage or present offerings to them. Permanent refuge [gtan gyi skyabs] means until the attainment of enlightenment. You cannot take refuge to worldly gods thinking that they can grant liberation from the suffering of samsara because they themselves are still dwelling in samsara. Some worldly gods are nevertheless regarded as members of the Buddhist sangha and are, therefore, worthy of offerings. They can grant temporary refuge and help. Gods who dwell within samsara are not free from egoclinging [bdag 'dzin]. Do not accept any of them as an ultimate or permanent refuge.

(2) Having gone for refuge to the dhamra, one should never harm any sentient being, not even in dreams. This is because the essence of the dharma is knowledge and compassion, as well as peace and happiness [zhi bde]. One with knowledge and compassion will never harm other beings. If you have a violent dream of harming or killing others, regret and amend that negativity immediately upon waking by offering confession.

(3) Having gone for refuge to the sangha, do not associate with those who hold extreme or biased views [mtha’ 'dzin gyi lta ba yod mkhan]. Not associate [mi ’grogs] means keeping a distance [mtha’ ring bso dgos] from such people, but it does not mean completely rejecting them. Furthermore, do not mingle with those who slander your personal teacher or the dharma. Do not accept teachers or systems which teach egoclinging or any extremist view of eternalism or nihilism since they are propagating a wrong path. The sangha are those who further and enhance one’s qualities and practice on the genuine path to enlightenment. In order to protect a beginner’s understanding of Buddhism from wrong ideas this refuge precept advises him not to associate with real tīrtikas. This is not a prohibition against having friendly relations with followers of other systems.

Text section 199:

A quote from the Pundarika-sūtra shows the purpose of paying respect to any representation of Buddha’s body, speech and mind:

Emanating a multitude of various forms,
They benefit beings by inspiring them to virtue.
In this context one must understand that Buddha is wisdom and not a person. Paying respect to the representations of Buddha’s body, speech and mind is not a personality cult. Buddha is the fruition of the path [lam gyi ‘bras bu], the ultimate wisdom attainable.

His nirmānakāya or emanations bestow great benefit on beings. According to Mipham Rinpoche,134 one can distinguish different nirmānakāyas of the Buddha: the ‘supreme nirmānakāya’ [mchog gi sprul sku], the ‘created nirmānakāya’ [bso ba sprul sku], the ‘rebirth nirmānakāya’ [skye ba sprul sku], and the ‘manifold nirmānakāya’ [sna tshogs sprul sku].

All representations of the Buddha’s body, speech and mind [sku gsung thugs rten] are considered to be ‘manifold nirmānakāya’. This term also includes relics of the Buddha as well as anything which can benefit sentient beings, such as lotus flowers, jewels, medicine, food, clothing, vehicles, bridges, and so forth.

Buddha Shakyamuni, as a bodhisattva, made countless aspirations that he might benefit all beings who see, hear, touch or think of him. As the result of his aspirations we are able to meet Buddha’s body, speech and mind through his three representations.

Buddha is not ‘a creator’ [byed pa po]. Buddha is the condition of happiness [bde ba’i rkyen], while the dharma is the cause of happiness [bde ba’i rgyu]. Based on statues, representations [tshab / rten] of the Buddha, practitioners can gather inconceivable merit. The statues themselves contain no blessing. Recognizing the statue as a representation of the Buddha carries the blessing. Having taken refuge, treat all representations of Buddha’s body, speech and mind with respect.

Some people hold the strange view that only the bodhisattvas are able to help sentient beings while the Buddha is too far removed from beings to help them. Based on this wrong idea these people vow to remain as bodhisattvas in samsara and do not aspire to reach complete enlightenment in order to help sentient beings.

In reality only a perfectly enlightened Buddha can truly help all sentient beings. The capacity of even a highly realized bodhisattva to reach all sentient beings is limited. Not even great bodhisattvas on the tenth level have the limitless wisdom, limitless compassion and limitless activity of a buddha. Not a single sentient being is excluded from the wisdom and compassion of a buddha.

‘Buddha’ [sangs rgyas] means that the obscuration of afflictions and the obscuration of cognition have both been completely ‘purified’ or ‘removed’ [sangs], and all wisdom qualities ‘unfolded’ [rgyas]. One aspect of the term ‘bodhi’ denotes absence [med pa], the absence of all that must be overcome. Another aspect of the term ‘bodhi’ denotes presence [yod pa], the presence of all that should be achieved and realized. ‘Bodhi’ and ‘buddha’ are both names for the final goal, the ultimate fruition, the aim we wish to achieve, the state of a completely enlightened buddha. Never think that the Buddha is a person [gang zag], a god [iha chen], a creator [byed pa po], or atma [bdag], a cosmic soul. Buddha is immeasurable wisdom [tsad med pa’i ye shes]. At this very instant, within limitless space, there are countless world systems, where countless beings are becoming bodhisattvas, and countless bodhisattvas are reaching complete and perfect enlightenment. On the absolute level [don dam] all buddhas are one in essence. On the relative level, in the perception of sentient beings, they appear individually distinct, in the same way that one sky can be reflected individually in countless water bowls.

One Buddha has the activity field of one billion world systems [’jig rten bye ba phrag brgya] because the beings in all these systems have accumulated a similar common karma [thun mong gi las] and therefore share similar perceptions. The Buddha appears to us as Buddha Shakyamuni, as a phenomenal perception [snang ba]. But the basis of that perception [snang gzhi] is the dharma[kāya [chos sku]. The actual Buddha is the dharma[kāya. The sanbhogakāya [longs sku] and the nirmānakāya [sprul sku] only appear in the perception of others [gzhan snang] and are not the actual Buddha.

Buddha’s dharma[kāya is limitless wisdom, limitless compassion and limitless activity. But his two form bodies [gzugs sku], the sanbhogakāya [longs sku] and the nirmānakāya [sprul sku], appear only to the beings in a limited number of world systems, that is, only in one billion world systems. Buddha’s two form bodies appear to beings of different degrees of merit and pure perception.

When Buddha was teaching at King Indrabhuti’s palace in Uddiyana, his nirmānakāya manifestation appeared to the shravaka arhats [nyan thos dgra bcom pa] and pratye kabuddhas [rang sangs rgyas] who were present. Simultaneously he appeared to the bodhisattvas and great yogins in his sanbhogakāya form, ornamented with the full sanbhogakāya attire. At the same time he was giving Hinayāna teachings to the shravakas and pratye kabuddhas, he was also imparting Vajrayāna teachings and empowersments to the king and his entourage.

All citizens of King Indrabhuti’s capital practiced Vajrayāna. Each citizen had a certain position in the mandala [dkyi ’khor]. Finally, after eight years of practice, the entire city flew up into the sky. Therefore, the area received the name Uddiyāna which means ‘area of those who fly’ [’phur ’gro’i gnas].

The sanbhogakāya manifestations are perceived by the bodhisattvas who dwell on any of the ten bodhisattva levels, from the first to the tenth. Each bodhisattva level perceives Buddha’s sanbhogakāya manifestations differently. The perception of the various bodhisattva levels differs in clarity [gsal po], vastness [rgyas pa], and purity [dag pa]. In the same way, the nirmānākāya manifestations of the Buddha are perceived differently by a pratyekabuddha, an arhat or an ordinary being.

Swift enlightenment in Vajrayāna is possible if a student has the pure perception to see his root guru as the dharmakāya of the Buddha. A student of lesser merit might perceive the same root guru as a great master or scholar. An ordinary being might perceive the very same root guru merely as a nice old man. A negative-minded person might perceive the same root guru as his enemy. A buddha appears in a pure or impure aspect due to the pure or impure perception of sentient beings. The terms ‘pure’ and ‘impure’ apply not to the Buddha himself but to the different perceptions of his manifestations by sentient beings.

Second, the three precepts concerning obligations are: (1) Having taken refuge in the Buddha, honor and respect any representation of the Buddha’s body and mind, even if it is only a tiny piece of a broken terracotta image. Raise it above your head, put it somewhere clean, have faith and perceive it with pure vision, considering it to be the true jewel of the Buddha. Treat every statue of the Buddha, whether or not it is artistically appealing, with respect.

(2) Having taken refuge in the dharma, respect any representation of Buddha’s speech, even if it is just a fragment of paper bearing a single syllable of the scriptures. Place it above your head, and consider it to be the true jewel of the dharma. Treat all dharma books with respect, and do not criticize them. Do not throw old dharma books or translations into the garbage, but instead burn them. Never put Buddhist scriptures or texts on the ground, never step over them, never put dirty objects on top of them or even pass dirty things over them. Never stain them. This is very important to observe.

To place books containing the scriptures directly on the floor or on a chair, to step over them, to wet your fingers with saliva to turn the pages and similar disrespectful behavior are all serious mistakes. The Buddha himself said:

In the last five-hundred-year cycle,
I will be present in the form of scriptures.
Consider them as identical to me,
And show them due respect.

In the same way as the Buddha manifests in the form of scriptures, the Great Mother Prajñāpāramitā [yum chen mo shes rab kyi pha rol tu phyin pa] is said to be present in the form of the gandhi, a wooden gong used to summon monks. The gandhi symbolizes [mtshon byed] Prajñāpāramitā and the vinaya describes in great detail the shape and use of the gandhi. Since the Buddha appears in the form of scripture one should show the same respect to the Buddhist scriptures as one would to the Buddha in person.

Furthermore, do not put images on top of scriptures. The scriptures represent the Buddha’s speech, teaching us what to do and what to avoid, and ensuring the continuity of his teachings. The scriptures are no different from the Buddha himself and are particularly sacred because they teach us the entire dharma. Therefore, treat with respect every dharma book written in any language.

(3) Having taken refuge in the sangha, consider anything that symbolizes it, be it the yellow belt of a fully ordained monk or a mere patch of red or yellow cloth, as the true jewel of the sangha. Honor and respect it, raise it above your head, put it somewhere clean, and regard it with pure vision. Treat all those who are pure monks, who endeavor in the precepts and uphold the sūtra-pitaka, vinaya-pitaka and abhidharmapitaka, with respect. Even impure beings who just wear monks robes must be treated with respect. As it is said:

In the future, when the teaching of the Buddha will decline,
All little pieces of red or yellow cloth
Will be collected by the gods and taken away as objects of faith
And will be placed in a stūpa on the peak of Mount Sumeru.

Text sections 204-205:

Third, the three supplementary precepts are: (1) Look upon your teacher, the spiritual friend who teaches you here and now what to do and what not to do, as the true jewel of the Buddha. Endeavor to serve and honor him and do not even so much as walk on his shadow.

(2) Consider every word of your sublime teacher as the jewel of the dharma. Accept everything he says without disobeying a single point.

(3) Consider the entourage of your sublime teacher, his disciples and your spiritual companions who have pure conduct as the jewel of the sangha. Respect them with your body, speech and mind, and never upset them, even for an instant.

These abovementioned precepts come into play only after a student has firmly committed himself and been accepted by a Buddhist teacher. Before committing yourself to a teacher-student relationship, you must study about the qualities of an authentic Buddhist teacher.135 You should check whether your prospective teacher embodies these qualities.
Particularly in the Secret Mantra Vehicle, your root guru is the main refuge—his body is the sangha, his speech the dharma, and his mind the Buddha. Recognize him, therefore, as the quintessential union of the three jewels, and see all his actions as perfect. Follow him with absolute trust, and try to pray to him all the time. Remember that to displease him with anything you do, say or think is to renounce the entire refuge, so make every effort to please him all the time.136 Just before passing away, the Buddha told Ānanda:

Do not feel sad, Ānanda.
Do not lament, Ānanda.
In future times I will Incarnate as spiritual guides
To help you and others.

135 See chapter one, text section 106.
136 The scriptures say that one should offer the three delights [mnyes pa gsum] to one’s Vajrayāna master. The supreme way to delight your master is through practicing meditation [grub pas mnyes par byed pa]. The second best way to delight your master is by serving him with body and speech [lus ngag gis zhabs tog]; and last, to delight him through material offerings [zang zing gi mchod pa].

The five common trainings [thun mong gi bslab bya lnga] as taught by Lord Atisha and put into poetry by Ngari Panchen are:

1. Never forsake the three jewels, not for gifts and not at the cost of your life [srog dang bya dkar dkon mchog gsum mi spong]: Whatever happens, good or bad, never forget to take refuge in the three jewels. Train yourself until you reach the point that even while feeling afraid in a nightmare you remember to take refuge. This will enable you to do so later in the intermediate state (Bardo). In short, place your entire trust in the three jewels, and never give up the refuge even at the cost of your life.

Once, in India, a Buddhist lay practitioner was taken prisoner by some tirtikas, who told him, “If you renounce taking refuge in the three jewels, we won’t kill you. Otherwise, we’ll put you to death.” He replied, “I can only renounce taking refuge with my mouth. I could never do so with my heart.” The heretics sliced the skin on his head with a knife in several portions. While peeling off each slice they asked him, “Do you renounce?” and his reply was always “No”. Finally, they killed him. We should really be like this layman. So, from the moment you enter the path of liberation and become a Buddhist, practice the taking of refuge along with its precepts, and never give them up even if your life is at stake.
2. However pressing the need, I will not seek any other means (than the three jewels) [dgos gal che yang thabs gzhari mi 'tsol]: No matter what happens to you, be it pleasant or unpleasant, good or bad, sickness or suffering, entrust yourself entirely to the three jewels. Recognize all well-being as springing from the compassion of the three jewels. It is said that everything pleasant and good in this world—even the slightest breeze on a hot day—comes from the compassion and blessings of the Buddha. In the same way, the smallest positive thought arising in your mind results from the inconceivable power of his blessings. Recognize Buddha’s compassion in everything that helps you and makes you happy. Whenever you encounter sickness or suffering, when demons and enemies create obstacles, or whatever else may befall you, just pray to the three jewels, and do not rely on any other methods of dealing with such problems. If you have to undergo medical treatment or make use of a healing ritual, do so in the recognition that those very things are the activity of the three jewels.

3. Do not fail to make offerings at the correct times [dus mchod mi bcag]: Make offerings to the three jewels as often as you can, every morning and evening, and offer as much as you can. This is especially important on certain days: the eighth day of every lunar month, the days of the full moon and new moon, and summer and winter solstices, which are all days that naturally have great energy [nus pa chen po’i dus]. On these days afflictions as well as positive energy are naturally enhanced. Therefore, it is important to practice and make offerings on these days. The tenth and the twenty-fifth day of the lunar month are special tantra days.

Observe the special times dedicated to the three jewels and to the life of the Buddha such as the four great festival days [dus chen] according to the Tibetan calendar. These are the following:

1) ‘The Festival of the Miracles’ [cho ‘phrul dus chen]: The first to the fifteenth day of the first Tibetan month commemorates the time when Buddha performed miracles. In order to increase the merit and to enhance the devotion of future disciples, Buddha displayed a different miracle each day for fifteen days. The fifteenth day is considered the actual festival day. The whole month is called ‘Bumgyur Dawa’ [‘bum’gyur zla ba], the month in which the results of all virtuous and non-virtuous activities are multiplied by a hundred thousand.

2) ‘Saga Dawa Düchen’ [sa ga zla ba dus chen]: The fifteenth day of the fourth Tibetan month commemorates Buddha’s birth in Lumbini, his enlightenment at age 35 at Bodhgayā, and his passing into parinirvāna at Kushinagara at the age of 80.137

3) ‘The Festival of the First Turning’ [chos ‘khor dus chen]: The fourth day of the sixth Tibetan month commemorates the first turning of the wheel of dharma. For seven weeks following his enlightenment, Buddha did not teach. Finally, encouraged by Indra and Brahma, he turned the wheel of dharma for the first time at Sarnath by teaching the four noble truths.

4) ‘The Festival of his Descent from Heaven’ [lha babs dus chen]: The twenty-second day of the ninth Tibetan month commemorates Buddha’s descent from the heaven of the thirty-three [skr. trayastrinsha]. Buddha’s mother had been reborn in Indra’s heaven. He repaid her kindness by leading her to liberation. At the same time, to benefit the other gods Buddha spent three months teaching in the realm of the gods before descending once more to earth.

All good and desirable circumstances in this life—comfort, happiness, popularity, profit or whatever—spring from the compassion of the three jewels. With such devotion and pure perception think, “I offer all this to them.” Offer the three jewels whatever sources of merit you create—prostrations, offerings, meditation on the Buddha, recitation of mantra and so on—and dedicate that merit to the benefit of all beings.

4. Establish yourself and others in refuge [rang gzhan skyabs ’gror ’god]: Once you have understood the benefits and blessings of taking refuge, you will become an example for others. When asked, explain to others the qualities of the three jewels and thus encourage them to take refuge. Entrust yourself and others to the three jewels both for this life and for lives to come, and practice refuge diligently.

You may relate to those who are close to you the feelings of devotion, happiness, certainty and so forth that the three jewels inspire in your mind. Your inspiration can inspire others. However, it is crucial to talk about the dharma and about going for refuge only when an auspicious connection [ten ’brel] to discuss the dharma has naturally arisen. Do not seek to create situations in order to proselytize. Even if you give advice and offer help, always let people decide for themselves whether or not they want to go for refuge or not.

You may talk to people who are interested and those who are neutral to the dharma. But never talk about the dharma to people who have a negative attitude toward it. If you give them an opportunity to slander the three jewels, their negative attitude will cause them endless suffering in the lower realms of samsara.

An auspicious connection is a circumstance that is not manipulated but that occurs naturally. An auspicious connection is uncontrived. What is uncontrived is natural. What is natural is endowed with the spontaneous and inconceivable power of the natural state [ten ’brel zhes pa ni ma bcos pa red, ma bcos pa ni rang bzhin red. rang bzhin la chos nyid gyi nus pa bsam gyis mi khyab pa lhun gyis grub pa yod do].

5. Wherever I go, I will prostrate to the Buddha of that direction [gar ’gro’i phyogs kyi sangs rgyas la phyag ‘tshal]: Learn to have faith and pure perception by recognizing everything that appears as being manifested by the three jewels. Whenever you go somewhere, on the way pay homage to the Buddha of that direction. Make the refuge prayer your constant daily practice. If you do not know any in particular recite the four-fold refuge prayer, which is common to all vehicles of Tibetan Buddhism:

Homage to the teacher.
Homage to the Buddha.
Homage to the dharma.
Homage to the sangha.

Or you may recite the four-fold refuge in Sanskrit:

Namo guru bhya
Namo buddhaya
Namo dharmaya
Namo sanghaya

While reciting these lines of refuge, visualize Buddha Shakyamuni in the sky in front of you. You may follow the visualization taught in Mipham Rinpoche’s text “The Liturgy of Shakyamuni—A Treasury of Blessings.” When you go to sleep, visualize the Buddha in your heart, and fall asleep with your mind concentrated on him. If you cannot do that, think of your teacher and the three jewels as being really present by your pillow, full of love and compassion for you. Then fall asleep with faith and pure perception, without losing the thought of the three jewels.

When eating or drinking, visualize the three jewels in your throat, and offer them the first taste of everything you consume. If you cannot do that, offer them the first mouthful or sip, thinking, “I offer this to the three jewels.”

138 See appendix for English translation of The Liturgy of Shakyamuni—A Treasury of Blessings [thub chog byin rlabs gter mdzod].

When you have new clothes to wear, before putting them on for the first time, lift them up and offer them mentally to the three jewels. Then put them on with the thought that the three jewels have given them to you.

Whenever you see anything that gives you joy or that you find desirable, offer it mentally to the precious three jewels: lovely gardens full of flowers, streams of clear water, beautiful houses, pleasant groves, vast wealth and possessions, beautiful men and women in fine clothes—anything.

When drawing water, make an offering to the three jewels by flicking a few drops into the air with your fingers before pouring it into your container.
Text sections 207-209:

Taking refuge has innumerable and inconceivable benefits. The Vimaladatta-paripṛchāsūtra says:

If all the merit of taking refuge
Had a physical form,
The whole of space
Would not be large enough to contain it.

Khenpo Kunpal has already mentioned several qualities and benefits of going for refuge in text sections 141 through 148. Further benefits can also be elaborated upon. One benefit of going for refuge is that you will not take rebirth in any of the three lower realms. To take refuge with a faith fully cognizant of the qualities of the three jewels unquestionably brings benefit. But even simply hearing the word “Buddha” or creating any link, tenuous as it may be, with any representation of the Buddha’s body, speech or mind can plant the seed of liberation, which ultimately will lead to the state beyond suffering.

Taking refuge also distances one from masses of negativity and increases virtue. By taking refuge you distance yourself from all negative actions and purify your formerly accumulated karmic obscurations. Even the most negative actions accumulated in the past are reduced and exhausted by going for refuge with sincere and intense faith. From the moment of going for refuge onward, the compassionate blessings of the three jewels will render all your thoughts positive until you naturally avoid all negativity.

Going for refuge temporarily secures the protection of beneficent deities and the realization of all one’s wishes. Moreover, obstacles caused by humans, demons and spirits cannot affect you. Practitioners who meditate on the profound meaning of the dharma can encounter many obstacles to their practice. But making a real effort to sincerely take refuge will transform all obstacles into favorable circumstances, and your merit will grow unceasingly.

The permanent benefit of going for refuge is that you will never part company from the thought of the three jewels, and you will find happiness and well-being both in this present life and in lives to come. Ultimately, you will obtain the state of buddhahood; swiftly perfecting the two accumulations you will attain enlightenment.

When you present offerings, offer all the positive things you hold in your mind. Now, in confession, lay open all the negative things that you have been holding in your mind. Never offer your negativity to the buddhas, but confess it. To confess [bshags pa] means ‘to cut off’ [mar gtub / mar gcad] or ‘to throw away’ [phar yug]. You can cut off or throw away all your misdeeds. It also connotes ‘to lay open’, ‘to lay bare’ or ‘to open up’ [kha phye ba]. Therefore, the phrase ‘to confess openly’ [mthol lo bshags] means ‘to lay open’ [mthol ba] and ‘to lay aside’ [bshags pa].

Confession should be understood like this: “I truly acknowledge that, being mistaken, I did something wrong. Now I will rectify my mistakes. I will purify myself and remove what is hidden inside.” Confess with a mindset of regret or repentance [’gyod pa / sun ’byin pa] about what you have done wrong coupled with the resolve to purify your former misdeeds.

In the sūtra tradition, to purify your misdeeds you visualize light radiating from the buddhas and bodhisattvas. In the tantra tradition, you visualize nectar dripping down from Vajrasattva. You acknowledge and regret all your misdeeds, deciding to purify them. You make the further resolve not to repeat the same mistakes in the future and not to stain your mind again.

At the outset, you must be able to identify a mistake or misdeed. You need to learn what constitutes virtuous and non-virtuous conduct. You need to learn that when you live your life according to the ten virtuous actions [dge ba bcu], you will create good karma, and you need to learn that committing the ten non-virtuous actions will lead to terrible results in this and future lifetimes for yourself and others.

You next try to remember all the misdeeds you have committed in this life. Although you cannot recollect your past lives, trust in the teachings of the Buddha who said that we have all taken rebirth in countless previous lifetimes in all possible states of existence. It is said that there is not even a single square inch of ground in all higher and lower realms that you have not stepped on in former lifetimes. With such a personal history you can deduce that you have committed all possible negative deeds and still carry these karmic seeds in your mind. We all have a tremendous amount of not yet ripened previous karma lying dormant in our mind-streams. Therefore, acknowledging all possible misdeeds done in this and previous lifetimes is crucial. Acknowledge all negative deeds you can remember as well as those you cannot.

Develop a feeling of deep regret and shame for what you have done. Feel so ashamed that you really want to rid yourself of the disgraceful deeds you committed in the past. Such shame and regret along with the fear of the dire consequences of your misdeeds will lead to a firm resolve never to repeat these misdeeds in the future. All the ingredients of acknowledgement, shame, regret and fear of karmic consequences are indispensable for a fully effective confession.
Many people do not know the difference between right and wrong. In east Tibet, for example, where long-standing family feuds are frequent, it is common to think: “I’ve done quite well in killing that enemy of mine. I’ve done the right thing.” Here, people who have taken the life of another human being think they have accomplished something wonderful. They actually feel happy and satisfied about their misdeeds. Such killing coupled with rejoicing in it is an enormously negative act, a grave negativity [sdig pa chen po].

Wrongdoing means harming others due to one’s own ignorance, aggression, desire, jealousy and miserliness. In fact, every time you harm someone else, you harm yourself. In order to prevent the consequences of your deeds from coming back to you, you must confess the harm that you have inflicted on others.

Do not, however, let confession develop into worrying [sems brel]. Practice confession as a ‘cutting off’ [mar bshags]. In one moment cut off all your negative patterns of the past and firmly resolve not to repeat them again. Do not hold on to regret continuously. Face the problem of your previous negativity, and apply the solution, the firm resolve not to repeat these actions in the future.

Text section 211 / stanza 27:

Stanza 27 describes the visualization of the objects for confession [bshags yul mgon du bya ba]. To make confession requires an object before which to confess. In the sutra tradition, these objects are the buddhas and bodhisattvas dwelling in countless buddha fields throughout the ten directions, who are all endowed with great compassion and wish to liberate all sentient beings from suffering and its causes. In the tantra tradition, the object is your own root guru in the form of Vajrasattva. Involve your body, speech and mind in the practice of confession. With your mind generate faith [dad pa] and devotion [mos gus] toward the objects of confession [bshags yul]. Imagine that they are truly present in the sky in front of you. Develop heartfelt regret for all of your previously committed misdeeds and negative actions. With your body assume the posture of devotion by joining your palms together in the anjali mudra. With your voice recite the words of your confession practice in a pleasant and melodious way.

Text sections 212:

An effective confession requires four powers [stobs bzhi]: 1) The power of remorse [sun ‘byin pa’i stobs], also called the power of regret [‘gyod pa’i stobs]; 2) the power of the support [rten gyi stobs]; 3) the power of the applied antidote [gnyen po kun tu sphyod pa’i stobs]; and 4) the power of resolve [sor chud pa’i stobs],139 also called the power of commitment [sdom pa’i stobs] or the power of turning away from mistakes [nyes pa las
The power of remorse is heartfelt regret about the non-virtuous deeds one has previously committed. Regret requires the knowledge [shes rab] of how to identify what virtue and non-virtue actually are. It further requires faith in karma, the law of cause and effect, and the wish to get rid of one’s misdeeds because one does not want to suffer their horrible consequences. Stanzas 28 through 46 cover the power of remorse.

The power of support means going for refuge to the three jewels, the buddhas, the dharma and the sangha, as the object for purification [dag rten du byed pa]. Knowing that only the three jewels can grant protection from the fears of the three lower realms, you go for refuge. Stanzas 47 through 53 cover the power of support.

The power of the applied antidote means that from now on you endeavor constantly in virtuous activities [dge ba’i las la shin tu brtson pa]. Stanzas 54 through 65 (first half) cover the power of the applied antidote.

The power of resolve is the commitment [dam bca’ ba] to abstain from this moment onward from all misdeeds, even at the cost of your life. Stanza 65 (second half) covers the power of resolve. The practice of confession is only effective if all four powers are complete.

Text section 213 / stanza 28:

In stanza 28 the practitioner develops remorse about the negative deeds he has committed over a very long timespan. The timespan includes the entire time one has been circling in samsara. Since samsara is beginningless, having no starting point, the timespan here is throughout beginningless samsara [thog ma med ldan ‘khor ba nas], lifetime after lifetime, i.e. this present lifetime and all previous lifetimes. Ignorantly [ma ‘tshal], without knowing [ma shes] the horrible karmic consequences of negative deeds, without knowing what to do and what to avoid, and being ignorant of karma, the law of cause and effect, one has committed various kinds of negative deeds. This refers to the ten non-virtuous actions [mi dge ba bcu], the five crimes with immediate retribution [mtshams med lnga], and so forth.

The karma of negative deeds [sdig pa] is accumulated in three ways: 1) actually committing them oneself [rang gis dngos su bgyis pa], 2) inciting others to commit [gzhan dag la bgyid du stsal ba], or 3) rejoicing in the negative deeds done by others [gzhan gys sdig pa byas pa la rjes su yi rang ba]. These three have equally severe consequences.
The karma of virtuous deeds [dge ba] is also accumulated in three ways: 1) actually performing virtue oneself, 2) inspiring others to perform virtuous actions, or 3) rejoicing in the virtue performed by others. These are equally meritorious. Both virtue and negativity depend on our minds.

For instance, if you rejoice in the actions of Mao Tse-Tung or Adolf Hitler, who were responsible for the deaths of millions of people, you create the same karma as if you had committed these killings yourself. Similarly, if you rejoice in Buddha’s setting the wheel of dharma in motion, you create the same merit that Buddha created. Your mind is that powerful, and you can attract that much harm or virtue.

If one hundred people decide that a person should be killed, each of these hundred accumulates the same negative karma. It is not that the actual killer accumulates most of the negativity while the other ninety-nine people accumulate less. Therefore, you must recognize these three ways of committing negativity as mistakes [nyes pa mthong] and at all cost avoid them in the future.

The gravity of non-virtuous and virtuous deeds varies according to the following factors: their duration [dus], their causes [rgyu], the objects [yul] toward which they are directed, their basis [gzhis], their essence [ngo bo], their application [sbyor ba], and their effects [byed las].

The only good quality of a negative deed is that it can be purified through confession. All negative deeds and mistakes can be confessed and purified because they are concepts ['du shes] and thoughts [mam rtags]. Even the most severe misdeeds such as the five crimes with immediate retribution can be purified.

Care must be taken, however, not to assume that confession alone is sufficient to purify all one’s past negativity. Through confession you lay open and confess [mthol zhing bshags pa] all your negative deeds; you put these former evil thoughts out of your mind and resolve to never again repeat them. Making the firm resolve to abstain from repeating a negative deed at all costs in the future is the best and most powerful aspect of confession.

Text section 214 / stanza 29:

The way to confess [bshags tshul] your negative deeds is to develop a regretful mind ['gyod sems] and confess them from the bottom of your heart. Confess without concealing [mi ´chab] or hiding [mi sbed] anything; lay everything open in front of the objects of confession [bshags yul], the buddhas and bodhisattvas endowed with compassion. Knowing that the fruition of your negative deeds will ripen and cause you tremendous harm, recognize them as faults [nongs pa].

215-216 / stanza 30:

One can inflict harm on others with one’s body, speech or mind. There are differences in the severity of a negative deed, depending on the sensitivity of the object. The most sensitive or perilous objects [yul gnyen po] are the three jewels. They are called ‘a field of qualities’ [yon tan can gyi zhing] since they are endowed with inconceivable qualities. The Vajrayāna root guru is considered to be identical with the Buddha and also belongs in the field of qualities.

Our parents constitute the most sensitive or perilous object after the three jewels. They are called ‘a field of benefits’ [phan ’dogs pa’i zhing] since they gave us life, nurtured us from early childhood onward, supplied us with clothing, shelter and education, thereby bestowing great benefits on us.

Our teachers [bla ma], such as khenpos [mkhan po] and masters [slob dpon], constitute the next most perilous object. They are called a ‘field of kindness’ [bka’ drin gyi zhing] since they taught us reading and writing, gave us instructions in Buddhism, and bestowed the precepts of individual liberation and the bodhisattva precepts upon us. Our Mahāyāna sūtra teachers are considered to be similar to the Buddha and belong to the field of kindness.

To commit misdeeds against these objects, whether with body, speech or mind, is therefore a very grave mistake. The most grave mistake is to fight, beat, hit or destroy the three jewels—including the fourth jewel, the root guru—one’s parents or one’s teachers. Slandering or speaking badly about them is also a heavy mistake. Holding wrong views and harboring ill-will toward them, furthermore, has dire consequences. These grave misdeeds are the most important things to confess.

Harming the three jewels does not only mean destroying the three conventional worldly jewels [’jig rten kun rdzob kyi dkon mchog], such as statues [sku gzugs], dharma books [po ti], and an assembly of a minimum of four fully ordained monks [dge slong bzhis tshogs]. Even merely harboring harmful intentions or having wrong views about the three jewels are very grave misdeeds.

Actually, one should treat one’s parents in the same way one would treat a king [rgyal po]. Especially concerning one’s mother one should always give her the victory and take defeat and blame upon oneself. Besides the Buddha and one’s root guru, the people who have extended us the greatest kindness really are our parents. We must therefore use all means to make them happy. Hitting one’s parents, uttering harsh words to them, making them upset, giving them angry looks, displaying bad moods in their presence, ignoring them and the like have horrible karmic consequences. All these acts are severe misdeeds [sdig pa chen po].

Another important group of people who deserve special attention are all practitioners who dwell in samādhi, especially those who practice the meditation of kindness, and particularly, all who traverse the path of the bodhisattvas. Never inflict the slightest harm on any of these, neither physical harm nor verbal abuse. Do not even harbor any bad intentions toward them.

Furthermore, stealing the property of the three jewels is an extremely negative deed. Misappropriating devotional objects, statues and old scriptures from monasteries and selling them is a severe fault. Inciting others to steal such objects as well as selling devotional objects that have been stolen both constitute extremely grave non-virtuous actions. On the contrary, making statues or printing texts carries great virtue and merit. An artist or printer of texts may distribute these freely or charge an appropriate amount without accumulating any negative karma.

140 One speaks of ‘a sangha group’ or ‘a sangha gathering’ [dge ’dun gyi sde] when a minimum of four monks who are in possession of the bhikṣu precepts stay together at the same place and time.

Text section 217:

The story of Kyer-Gang-Pa suffering from tiny letter A’s piecing his skin because he accepted money to recite Buddhist scriptures but failed to recite them teaches that he had to experience the karmic consequences of his negative action even after becoming a siddha.

Text section 218:

One of the worst misdeeds anyone can commit, which is almost beyond purification through confession, is misappropriating the ‘property of the sangha’ [dge ‘dun pa’i dkor]. The property of the sangha of the ten directions refers to the ‘general property’ of all the sangha members, wherever they may be as well as to general offerings made to the monastery. While mishandling these offerings is a grave offence, an even greater fault is the mishandling of offerings presented directly to the sangha. Offerings that sponsors have given particularly for monks must be directly passed on to them. The monastery is not allowed to keep any portion of such offerings. The monastery treasurer must use the money exactly according to the sponsor’s instructions. For example, he cannot use money intended for the monks to carry out monastery construction work; nor can he use money intended for construction to buy food for the monks.

In short, one who steals, robs, does business with or takes with deceit even the smallest items which belong to the sangha will certainly take rebirth in hell since such a deed cannot be purified through confession. This is clearly stated in the sūtras. Stealing from the sangha is a graver misdeed than violating one’s Vajrayāna samayas. One must exercise such extreme care that the very same coins and bank notes that the sponsor gave for the monks are directly passed on to them without even changing the coins or notes into other denominations.

The nomads in Tibet used dried yak dung to make a fire. When they camped near a monastery, they would take a piece of yak dung to light at the fire of the monastery’s kitchen. After they had started their own fire, they always returned a piece of yak dung to the monastery to replace the fire flame they had borrowed. When you take even a little thing from a monastery you must replace it right away or you will suffer karmic consequences. Furthermore, you should never use any possessions belonging to the sangha.

Moreover, many stories recount how people who broke in anger a clay cooking pot [phru ba] that belonged to the sangha took rebirth in a clay-pot-like hell. In general, Buddha said that something that is given to the upper temple should not be used for the lower temple and vice versa. The summer earnings of the sangha should not be distributed during the winter; nor should the winter earnings be handed out during the summer. What was given today should not be handed out tomorrow. When the sponsor says that a donation should be given to the sangha on this very day, the treasurer must not give the donation to the sangha even a day later.

Text section 220:

Spitting at or smearing mucus on the walls or pillars of the temple hall of the sangha [dge ‘dun gyi ‘du khang] is absolutely not appropriate and will result in rebirth in a wall or pillar-like hell realm. Never stain a temple, the living quarters of the monks, or any part of a monastery.

Again, Khenpo Kunpal reiterates the injunction against using any sangha property, not even a dustbin or a broom, as this leads to rebirth in a dustbin or broom-like hell realm. Distributing the earnings of the sangha during the wrong season causes rebirth as an insect with a very thin waist. Street dogs with horrible skin diseases are said to be the rebirth of people who misused sangha property or of those government officials who mishandled public funds.

Many monks in the past gave back their vows to the Buddha, meaning they gave up their vows, as they did not want to create the bad karma of living off monastic property without being worthy of it. When they told the Buddha that they did not want to be monks any longer as they felt they could not handle monastic property without creating bad karma, Buddha honored their decision and praised them for acting very properly.

The true owners of monastic property [dkor gyi bdag po] are arhats, pratyekabuddhas and the perfectly enlightened Buddha, those who have attained the path of no-morelearning [mi slob pa’i lam]. All who have attained the path of seeing [mthong lam] and the path of meditation [sgom lam], such as stream-enterers, once-returners and nonreturners are the true recipients for gifts [yon yongs su sbyongs ba chen po].

Buddha also said that those who keep all their monastic vows intact, who sincerely study [thos], contemplate [bsam] and meditate [sgom], may also use gifts given to them as well as sangha property. But monks who do not maintain perfect discipline and do not study, contemplate or meditate should never use monastic property or receive gifts given to the sangha.

Those monks who are on the path of accumulation [tshogs lam] and the path of application [sbyor lam] are still ordinary beings [so so’i skye bo]. They include the following: those who follow the tradition of reading, studying and reflecting on the teachings [klog pa thos bsam gyi ’khor lo], those who follow the tradition of practicing meditation and renunciation in solitude [spong ba bsam gtan gyi ’khor lo], and those who follow the tradition of working for the dharma [bya ba las kyi ’khor lo]. All monks following one of these three traditions [’khor lo rnam gsam] have permission to receive gifts.

The noble sangha is able to receive any kind of offering and remain uncorrupted. But someone who receives offerings on the pretence of being a monk or an exalted being will be corrupted by accepting the offerings. To be a proper recipient of offerings one should at least be perfect in discipline [tshul khrims phun sum tshogs pa] or dwell in the practice of the two stages, visualization stage and completion stage.

Someone who does not fit into either of these categories but accepts offerings under the guise of being qualified to receive them will accumulate great demerit. The unjust receipt of gifts, possessions and property of the sangha is almost impossible to purify through confession.

Thus, it is said that what has been given to the sangha is like poison when misused. Even a lama or rinpoche who heads a monastery must be extremely conscientious about handling donations given for the monks. All such donations must be distributed immediately, or the lama or rinpoche will suffer dire consequences. The lama or rinpoche may use donations given for his own use or for work he himself is to perform, or that are given to him personally simply out of devotion, with no negative consequences. But if a sponsor designates money for the monastery or for the sangha, or if he gives money for rituals to be performed by the sangha, then that donation is considered the ‘heavy’ property of the sangha [dge ‘dun gyi dkor nag po] and should never by used by the lama or rinpoche in any other way. Such an offering does not belong to him but to the sangha. In this situation, the lama is functioning as the monastery treasurer. His duty is to pass such donations on immediately. Text sections 217 to 241 contain many stories describing the dire karmic consequences of misappropriating monastic property.

Khenpo Kunpal probably put these stories in the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra commentary with managers of monasteries who misused donations in mind. Nevertheless, whenever we as ordinary practitioners stay in a monastery, we must be very careful about how we act. Living as a servant of a lama or as a serious practitioner in a monastery, one is allowed to receive monastic food and use monastery facilities. But if someone just lives on monastic property without serving any real function or without compensating the monastery for room and board, using monastic facilities and eating monastic food is like eating poison.

A slight misuse of monastic property might seem very insignificant, an action not even punishable according to the law of the country. However, the rules and regulations for the monks cannot be compared to the laws and customs of a country. All rules for monks and nuns were formulated by the Buddha, who alone knew the workings of karma completely.

It is said: “A cause as tiny as a sesame seed can have a result as huge as Mount Sumeru.” We have committed many mistakes [nyes pa] and negative deeds in the past, and we carry these in our minds as seeds which will inevitably ripen one day, like a disease lying dormant in our body. When our negative deeds ripen and manifest, we inevitably take rebirth in the hell realms. In order to remove these causes and consequences, these dormant seeds and their ripening, we confess to the buddhas and bodhisattvas all our negative deeds one by one and openly, hiding nothing.

Big monasteries in east Tibet had a separate residence for each important lama with its own treasurer and managers. The ‘treasurer’ or ‘general office manager’ [phyag mdzod] is the person in charge of the finances of one lama’s residence [bla brang]. In Tibetan monasteries the general manager is often a lay person [mi skya]. The person responsible for buying and storing food and provisions for all the monks in one lama’s residence is called ‘the larder manager’ [gnyer pa / spyi khag]. In east Tibet, this person is normally appointed or elected to his post for five years. The posts of treasurer and larder manager are the most powerful positions in a monastery. Every important lama also has a private secretary [drung yig]. The person in charge of butter lamps in a temple hall is called the ‘temple servant’ [dkon gnyer].

Any negativity committed toward Buddha must be confessed and amended directly to Buddha himself. Someone who has committed any negativity toward the dharma, should reprint many volumes of dharma books. A student who has spoken badly about his teacher should confess and amend this wrongdoing directly to his teacher. Someone who has committed any of the above misdeeds in regard to the sangha should offer confessions and make many offerings to the sangha itself. Negative deeds toward your parents must be confessed and amended directly with them.

Text section 243 / stanza 31:

Since we sentient beings are under the power of ignorance [ma rig pa], we commit errors [nor ba]. We can, however, confess our errors and mistakes. For as long as we allow negative deeds to remain in our minds their consequences will harm us. Confession enables us to remove our former misdeeds, and the sooner we eliminate them through confession the better.

Regret [‘gyod sems] is an aspect of wisdom-knowledge [shes rab], the ability to identify one’s wrongdoings [nor ba ngos ’dzin pa] coupled with the wish to get rid of them. The moment one realizes one is eating poison, one immediately stops eating it and tries to get it out of the system. As long as we cannot identify negative deeds for what they are, confession is not possible. As long as we cannot identify a substance as poison we continue to eat it. Therefore, we must learn that the ten non-virtuous actions [mi dge bcu], the five crimes with immediate retribution [mtshams med lnga], and so forth are negative deeds with horrible karmic consequences, which will destroy our happiness like rust corrodes iron.

A mind filled with negativity is like a mind consumed by fire. At some point in time one will become aware of one’s wrongdoings and will develop a strong feeling of guilt. The thought,”I have done wrong” [nga bya ba ngan pa byas song] will stay in your mind like a heavy weight [lici ba]. You will no longer be able to rejoice in your negative actions. You will lose respect for yourself, becoming unhappy and dissatisfied. Losing confidence in yourself, you will no longer be able to look at yourself without feeling disgust.

Without knowing how to remedy their evil deeds, some people fall into such a state of despair that they see no alternative other than suicide. This state of mind, called ‘guiltKhenpo ridden’, is very different from what is called ‘regret’ [‘gyod sems]. Regret arises from wisdom-knowledge and is the ability to identify one’s wrongdoings coupled with the wish to get rid of them. Knowing that the mind-stream can be purified through the method of sincere confession, the feeling of guilt does not overpower the mind. Visualize the buddhas and bodhisattvas before you in the sky. Bring to mind your misdeeds and declare them aloud, confessing them to the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Going down on your knees, placing your hands on the ground, and touching your forehead to the ground is a very effective way to offer confessions. Do not dwell too long on regret over your past negative actions. Dedicate short but repeated periods of time to developing regret, but do not let your practice of confession slip into a mind filled with worry [sems brel] and guilt. Purify your mind through short practice periods of sincere confession. Confession removes both the misdeed and its karmic consequences.

Anger [zhe sding] leads to rebirth in the hell realms; ignorance [gti mug] to rebirth in the animal realm; and miserliness [ser sna] to rebirth in the preta realm. Pride [nga rgyal] is the cause for rebirth in the god realm; jealousy [phag dog] for rebirth in the asura realm; and desire [dod chags] for rebirth in the human realm.

Clinging to the stains of various misdeeds [nyes pa du mas skyon chags pa] in our minds, means that just as rust clings to iron, motivated by these afflictions, we have committed innumerable wicked deeds with our body, speech and mind. We have created the causes [rgyu] for taking rebirth in samsara, and have caused obstacles for the path to liberation. We confess before the compassionate guides [‘dren pa thugs rje can], the buddhas and bodhisattvas, who lead all those who have committed the most intolerable acts [shin tu mi bza’i las byis pa de dag thams cad] out of the three lower realms of samsara into the three higher realms and to liberation.

Text section 244 / stanza 32:

Do not die before offering sincere confessions to the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Trust in your ability to purify your negative deeds through confession. All the abovementioned negative deeds bear horrible karmic consequences, and must be confessed quickly since we cannot know when death will come. We may even die this very day. We have seen many people die young; we have seen many people of our own age die suddenly. Why should death not come to us as well?

We experience the suffering of being cut off from life at the moment of death [‘chi kha gnad gcod kyi sdu gbsngal]. While dying we will experience great fear, pain or sickness. We will feel our life draining out as the elements dissolve one after another [‘byung ba thim rim]. When the earth element dissolves into earth, the heaviness of the body impairs one’s ability to raise oneself. The power to stand up and move is exhausted. When the water element dissolves into water, fluids issue from the mouth and nostrils. When the fire element dissolves into fire, the mouth and nose become extremely dry. The body loses heat from the extremities inward. When the wind element dissolves into the vital energy, the breath becomes erratic, and the limbs struggle. The eyes roll back in the head, and the breath does not return. These are the signs of a person dying. That stage in the process of death is called the ‘bar do’ of the moment of death [‘chi kha bar do].

We will next experience the suffering of the intermediate state after death [shi nas bar do’i sdrug bsgal]. When body and mind separate one enters into the ‘bar do’ of the natural state’ [chos nyid bar do]. The light manifestations of the peaceful and wrathful deities appear.

Following this, one enters into the ‘bar do’ of existence’ [srid pa bar do] where one travels in a mental body [yid kyi lus]. Propelled by previous karma, one is blown around like a feather in the wind. The mind finds no rest at all, and the thought, “I am dead,” is a source of tremendous misery. Karma drives this mental body to the future place of rebirth.

Finally, we are forced to take rebirth and experience the suffering of the three lower realms in the next life [phyi ma ngan song gi sdrug bsgal]. These various forms of suffering all arise from one’s own negative deeds and non-virtuous actions. The countless evil deeds committed in past lifetimes will certainly ripen. That is the law of cause and effect.

At the moment of death all major deeds of our entire life flash through our mind. We will clearly remember the good and the bad things we have done. If we have committed great evil our minds will fall into a state of despair and regret that we never practiced dharma. Knowing that we will go to the lower realms leads to great fear.

One’s state of mind at the moment of death is of utmost importance. A Buddhist practitioner who has purified his mind-stream throughout his life might die in a peaceful and virtuous state of mind or might even be able to recognize his buddha nature at the moment of death. That is a very peaceful way of dying. But even a Buddhist practitioner can die in a state of great physical pain or fear. In that case, completely entrusting your mind to Buddha or Guru Rinpoche rather than focusing on the fear and pain is of crucial importance.

A person who dies without having purified his negative deeds through confession will certainly take rebirth in the three lower realms and experience intense suffering. No matter what he does at the point of death, it will be difficult for him to be liberated with certainty [nges par], beyond any doubt [gdod mi za bar], from his negative deeds, the causes for taking rebirth in the three lower realms, and from their results, the experience of suffering in the three lower realms. What method can free him? It is too late and nothing can be done. He will have to experience the consequences of his negative deeds.
Therefore, as practitioners, we should begin the practice of confession immediately. Knowing now about the suffering of the three lower realms, we should immediately develop heartfelt regret [’gyod sems] about our former misdeeds. We should be frightened and go for refuge to the three jewels. We need to resolve to eliminate these negative deeds which are the causes for future suffering. This is like deciding no longer to associate with evil friends. In this way we must distance ourselves from our former negative patterns.

We need the mental resolve [sdom sems] to abstain from repeating these negative actions in the future. This is the power of resolve. As the remedy [gnyen po] for our former negative actions, we need to endeavor tirelessly from now on in virtue. This is the power of the antidote.

Many people feel unable to firmly resolve to abstain from further wrong-doing. They think it will be impossible to keep this promise. Such thinking is disempowering. Confession is part of mind-training [blo sbyong], and you train in confession until you can do it. A practitioner must repeatedly renew the resolve to abstain from committing misdeeds in the future. Promise yourself, “I will no longer commit any non-virtuous actions.” Through such repeated promises your mind will become strong and confident.

As a Buddhist you must assume responsibility for your own afflictions. Do not blame others to justify your negative actions. Thinking, “He treated me badly and therefore I hate him,” does not save you from the consequences of your anger. Any affliction that arises in your mind is a fault [nor ba] whether or not there is a so-called justification. A Buddhist practitioner must guard his mind against the rise of afflictions. As a Buddhist, never allow your mind to generate non-virtue.

To summarize, the practice of confession has four steps: 1) Visualize the buddhas and bodhisattvas as the object to whom you offer confession [bshags pa’i rten]. 2) Bring to mind all your negative deeds. Acknowledge them for what they are, and develop the wish to rid yourself of that kind of karma. Develop a deep sense of regret [’gyod sems].

Keep nothing hidden in your mind. Bring everything out into the open and actually confess it. Assume a humble position with your body while confessing. 3) Form the strong resolve [sdom sems] to abstain from repeating non-virtuous deeds in the future, thereby completely distancing yourself from negativity. 4) Finally, apply the antidote of virtuous deeds [gnyen po dge ba’i las]. From now on infuse your mind with goodness. Virtue and goodness have a great healing qualities. Generate the confidence that your negative deeds have now been purified.

You might think that although you will die some day, right now you have no time to make confessions. Actually, however, you have no way of knowing when you are going to die. Be aware that all the conditions for your immediate death have already come together. There are many circumstances that could cause your death at any given time. The Māra of Death [chi bdag gi bdu] could arrive any moment. He will not listen if you plead with him to wait because you have not finished this or that job or have not yet made your confessions. Whether or not you have confessed, whether or not you are sick, the time of your death is utterly uncertain. Therefore, put no trust [yid mi brtan] in this fleeting life [glo bur ba’i tshe]. Start immediately to free yourself from all past evil deeds through confession. Then you will have no suffering in the future. The Māra of Death is impermanence [mi rtag pa] or time [dus]. The Māra of Death is also called ‘the enemy as time’ [dus dgra]. Impermanence does not halt for even a second. No matter what crucial work lies ahead of you waiting to be completed, impermanence will not halt for this task to be carried out. Death can strike at any time.

You do not know the circumstances of your death—when, where or how you will die. You might die even today. Start your confession right now.

The quote, “Many a healthy person dies during the lifespan (remaining to) someone who is terminally ill,” indicates the uncertainty of life [tshe la nges pa med pa], even for one in perfect health. For example, someone with terminal cancer knows he will die soon. But while he lies ill, many healthy people die who have no fatal sicknesses. Not only the sick and old die. The young and healthy die as well. Life is as fleeting as a candle in the wind or a sunbeam that breaks through the clouds. Therefore, practice confession as soon as possible.

Text section 247:

Nāgarjuna in his Suhṛt-lekha [spring yig] compares the fleeting conditions of this life to a wind-blown water bubble. The odds of dying are much greater than the odds of continuing to live. He is astounded that life continues from one breath to the next and finds it utterly surprising that one still awakens from sleep. Every morning when we wake up, like Nāgarjuna we should feel surprised that we are still alive. We should meditate with joy and gratitude that we have maybe one more day to practice the dharma. Think, “Through the blessing of the Buddha, through the power of my former virtue, I might have one more day to live. I will use this day for dharma practice and will not waste any time with worldly activities.”

Do not let your life pass by without experiencing wonder at being alive. Consider every day you live as an extra bonus. In fact, every second we remain alive is most precious. When you meditate intensely on the impermanence of life you understand the preciousness of time. Among all concepts the concept of impermanence is said to be supreme. Eventually you will gain such an understanding of impermanence that you will no longer waste a single moment of your life. Failing to appreciate their lives, many people let life go to waste without practicing sincerely. Live your entire life as if each moment could be your last. Make your plans only for one day of practice at a time. Embrace all your activities with bodhicitta.

When the time of death comes, you will have to go alone and leave all your friends and relatives behind. Generally, life is spent supporting friends and relatives and fighting enemies with a mind clouded by attachment, resentment, ignorance, jealousy and pride. In the name of helping friends and fighting enemies, people kill, steal and 141 The term ‘someone who is terminally ill’ [gcong can] means a ‘person with a fatal sickness’, a sick person [mi na tsha can] who will not recover from his sickness [na tshad drag mi thub pa], who will certainly die [gtan gos shi ‘gro gi red]. The term ‘healthy person’ [gcong med] refers to a person without any fatal disease. ‘Many a’ [brgya] is a pural particle. commit various kinds of evil deeds. Sometimes you feel upset about a person and the thought, “I should really kill this person or at least beat him up” arises in your mind.

These kinds of thoughts become very powerful when three factors come together: 1) thinking a negative thought with intensity [shugs chen po], 2) continuously [rgyun ma chad pa] entertaining such a thought, and 3) feeling no regret [’gyod pa med pa] about having such a thought. If these three factors are gathered in your mind, this negative energy will actually ripen into a karmic fruition.

If you just occasionally feel strong resentment against someone, if bad thoughts come to your mind from time to time, as long as you recognize this to be a fault, such negative energy will not result in karmic ripening. Regretting negative thoughts is like pressing the delete button on a computer. Sincerely confess all the infinite negative thoughts you have had in this and all former lives. They are a strong negative force.

Confession done with heartfelt regret is very powerful. You can actually purify many old obscurations through confession. Confession directly purifies obscurations by addressing them individually, while gathering the accumulations of wisdom and merit purifies obscurations indirectly, in a general manner. Once your obscurations are purified, realization dawns in your mind.

In stanza 34 you develop strong regret for having accumulated so much meaningless [don med] negativity since you failed to realize that you will leave everything behind. When you die, you will die alone, without any friend, leaving behind your place [sa cha], country [yul ris], relatives [gnyen], friends [grogs], community [srid sde], enemies [dra], companions [gnyen], family [khyim bza’ tshang] and so forth. You will be pulled out of this life like a hair pulled from butter [mar gyi dkyil nas spu bton pa bzhin]. But, unaware of this, motivated by attachment and aversion, for the purpose of supporting your friends and defeating your enemies, you commit many negative deeds such as killing, stealing, lying and so forth. Thinking about all the negative deeds that you have accumulated for the sake of your friends and enemies, develop strong regret. Through confessing your evil deeds with true regret, you disconnect yourself from your own negativity and thus change your character.

Actually, committing all these negative deeds is totally pointless as sooner or later your enemies will die anyway, even if you do not defeat or kill them. All the friends and relatives you support and maintain are motivated by egotism [rang ‘dod] and egoclinging [bdag ‘dzin] and will not bring you ultimate benefit. Through karmic and social connections you call people ‘friends’. Through genetic ties you call people ‘relatives’. Since you, your friends and relatives, and all your enemies will die too, since in fact the entire universe and all its inhabitants will cease to be, committing all kinds of wicked deeds for the sake of friends and foes is completely meaningless.

Nevertheless, in spite of knowing all of this, we continue to be driven by the same afflictions. Our mind seems crazed by intense attachment to the five sense pleasures of sight, sound, smell, taste and touch. In order to make your mind calm and clear you should go to an isolated place and stay for some time in retreat. In such a situation you might be able to gain some understanding of impermanence. Such insights will reveal the meaninglessness of worldly pursuits. You will develop strong regret and think, “Motivated by attachment and aversion for the sake of friends and foes, I accumulated negative deeds. This was utterly pointless. I was so deluded.”

Text section 250 / stanza 36:

For example, if in last night’s dream you enjoyed the five sense pleasures or if you dreamed you were subduing enemies, supporting friends, achieving gain and honor and so forth, upon waking this morning it became a mere memory. Nothing concrete remained. Similarly, all your past experience in real life is reduced to a mere memory.

Only recollections remain. If this is the only outcome of all your struggles to protect your friends and defeat your enemies, you obviously wasted your time and energy. The true result of all your negative deeds is that the energy of these negative mind-sets [ngan sems kyi nus pa] stays with you. This negative energy lies dormant in your mind and is what must be purified through confession. If you fail to purify this negative energy, even though you may be unaware of it, this negativity will eventually ripen in your mind and lead you to the three lower realms. Think, “My accumulation of so many negative deeds for the sake of this short and dream-like life was utterly pointless and harmful to myself and others. It was wrong. From now on, I will endeavor only in

In this very life, moreover, you can see how friends become enemies and enemies become friends. You see your friends and enemies dying, and all that remains of these loving or hateful relationships is the thought, “My old friend has passed away,” or, “My enemy has died.” Through this observation you realize that all the terrible things you did to others in order to maintain relationships with friends and overcome enemies were utterly pointless.

Although your friends and enemies have perished, the wrong-doing that you committed has not died. Never for a moment assume that your negative deeds will disappear with the passing of time. The energy of your former negative deeds stays with you and you will eventually experience a terrible karmic result. For as long as you have not overcome your dualistic mind, your former misdeeds remain constantly with you.

This negativity can be purified through several methods. The supreme method is to overcome your dualistic mind through the realization of profound emptiness. Through the wisdom that realizes egolessness [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab], your own mind essence, all your wicked deeds will be eradicated. In addition, gathering the two accumulations of merit and wisdom purifies negative deeds. Negative karma can be purified through heartfelt regret and confession, through strong compassion and devotion and through training in pure perception [dag snang].

All these methods enable one to overcome old habitual patterns [bag chags snying pa]. Beings who are not yet bodhisattvas can greatly reduce the karmic effect of their former misdeeds by practicing confession endowed with the four powers. But understand one point very clearly: Only when a bodhisattva has realized profound emptiness can all his negative karma and its ripening be utterly eradicated. Once that realization is stabilized, dualistic mind is overcome and neither an experiencer nor an experience of karmic ripening remains.

If, however, you fail to apply any of these methods, your former evil deeds will follow you like a shadow follows the body, and the karmic ripening of your deeds will remain waiting ahead of you. Karma is nothing other than the power of your own mind [sems kyi nus pa], which will accompany your wherever you go. The one who takes rebirth is your mind, and the positive and negative tendencies in your mind are always with you, ready to manifest, ready to ripen as a result of your deeds. Therefore, if you do not want to suffer the consequences you must rid yourself of the negative forces in your mind.
Text section 252:

When we die, body and mind separate, and we take a new rebirth. The habitual patterns of our mind [sems kyi bag chags] remain with us however. These habitual patterns are nothing other than our karma [las], our past volitional actions. Karma thus follows us like a shadow follows the body. For as long as we hold aggression in our mind, our mind holds the seeds for rebirth in the hell realms. The hell realm only ceases to exist for us when aggression has ceased in our mind.

Text section 253:

Whatever karma we create, its fruition remains ahead of us [las kyi ’bras bu mdun na gnas pa], waiting for us [mdun na sngas bsdad ‘dug]. Since Buddha’s cousin Nanda [dga’ bo] was very attached to samsara, Buddha took him to the hell realms and to the celestial realm of the thirty-three [sum cu rtsa gsum gyi lha yul] to show him what karma was waiting for him. After this Nanda overcame all attachment to his wife Sundari [mdzes ma] and to the most beautiful of all goddesses, and he became an arhat.142

A donor called Shuka [mdang ldan] offered a park [kun dga’ ra ba] to the Buddha. While Shuka was measuring a location for the garden’s construction, Shariputra [sha ri’i bu] could see that the fruition of this tremendous meritorious action would ripen for Shuka during his very lifetime [tshe ‘di la].143 This type of karma is called ‘karma experienced within this life’ [mthong chos myong ’gyur gyi las].

When great lamas and celebrities travel, they have a man literally called the ‘carpet spreader’ [gdan byams], whose function is to prepare their daily accommodations in advance. He travels half a day ahead to set up camp. He sets up the residence [gnas gzhis btang ba], builds the hearth [thab bzungs] and so forth.

Just as all these preparations are made in advance before a great lama arrives, so all the preparations for the ripening of our karma, positive as well as negative, are already in place. In the same way as lamas and celebrities are received by their servants, we will be received and welcomed either by the henchmen of Yama, the Lord of Death, or by celestial beings and protectors.

We neither know where we came from in our previous lifetimes nor do we know where we will go when we die. We are like little seasonal insects that only live from spring to autumn, flying around without any orientation. We know it is said that we will very soon cease to exist, but we do not truly realize this. We do not actually believe that the evil we committed in the past is going to catch up with us. Instead we think that we will probably have a long lifespan.

We tend to believe in the permanence of life, perceiving our personal life as truly existing. We follow cultural conventions as though they were laws of nature, and cling to these fixations and deep-rooted beliefs strongly. Despite being ephemer al [glo bur ba], we believe in our own greatness and attach considerable importance to ourselves and to our activities, thus intensifying our fixations and attachments to life. The more important we think we are, the more attachment and fixations we build up. In fact, however, we are always on the verge of death and none of our worldly activities are of any importance at all. In the face of death they are utterly meaningless. Only the dharma can benefit us. Not realizing this, we commit various wicked deeds out of ignorance, aversion and attachment, thereby accumulating much negative karma.

Being ignorant about what to do and what not to do, and driven by feelings of attachment to our own group and our own goals as well as feelings of aversion toward other groups and what we do not desire, we have committed and accumulated various evil deeds such as killing, stealing and the like. We have committed the ten non-virtuous actions, the five crimes with immediate retribution, the five secondary crimes with immediate retribution, the four serious faults, the five perverted ways of sustenance and others. Generate strong regret in your heart, thinking that the karmic fruition of these negative deeds will be unbearable.

The ten non-virtuous actions [dge ba bcu] are: 1) taking life [srog gcod pa], 2) taking what is not given [ma byin par len pa], 3) sexual misconduct [log g.yem], 4) speaking lies [rdzun smra ba], 5) sowing discord [phra ma byed pa], 6) harsh speech [tshig rtsub], 7) worthless chatter [ngag kyal], 8) covetousness [rnab sems], 9) wishing harm to others [gnod sems] and 10) wrong views [log lta].

The five crimes with immediate retribution [mtshams med pa lnga] are: 1) killing one’s father [pha ggod pa], 2) killing one’s mother [ma ggod pa], 3) killing an arhat [dra bcom pa ggod pa], 4) creating a split in the sangha [dge 'dun gyi dbyen byed pa] and 5) malevolently causing a buddha to bleed [de bzhin gshegs pa'i sku la ngan sems kyi khrag 'byin pa].

bodhisattva [byang sems nges gnas gsod pa], 3) killing a practicing sangha member [slob pa’i dge ‘dun gsod pa], 4) preventing the income of the sangha [dge ‘dun gyi ‘du sgo ‘phrog pa] and 5) destroying a stūpa [mchod rten bshig pa].

1) Since a female arhat has overcome the obscuration of afflictions she would never engage in sexual conduct. Therefore raping a female arhat is a severe crime. 2) A true [nges gnas] bodhisattva refers to a ‘noble being bodhisattva’ who is dwelling on one of the bodhisattva levels, as well as to those genuine beginning bodhisattvas, endowed with great bodhicitta, who will become true bodhisattvas in the future. 3) A practicing sangha member refers to those practitioners endowed with the precepts of individual liberation who practice the path of study, contemplation and meditation [thos bsam bsgom pa’i lam la slob pa’i dge ‘dun]. 4) Preventing the income of the sangha means to keep others from making donations and presenting offerings to the sangha. 5)

The four serious faults [lic bzhis] are: 1) the serious fault of sitting at the head of the row of scholars [mkhas pa’i gral gong lic], 2) the serious fault of appropriating a tantrika’s wealth [sngags pa’i nor lic], 3) the serious fault of accepting the prostration of a fully ordained monk [dge slong gi phyag lic] and 4) the serious fault of eating a practitioner’s food [sgrub pa po’i zas lic].

These are four serious mistakes a practitioner should avoid: 1) One should never sit higher or at the top of a line of scholars, meaning those more learned than oneself. Doing this indicates that you do not acknowledge and accept the qualities of others, that you do not give respect to those who deserve it.

2) The wealth and possessions of a tantrika are as sensitive or perilous as the possessions of the sangha.

3) Ordinary people should always avoid standing or sitting in front of monks when the monks are offering prostrations. Monks are the upholders of the training in discipline, the precious vinaya, the sublime dharma. The vinaya is considered to be both dharma and Buddha, that is to say doctrine [bstan] and teacher [ston pa]. Among the three trainings of discipline, samādhi, and wisdom-knowledge, the training in discipline [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa] is considered to be the most precious, being both dharma and Buddha.

Among the three pīṭakas, the vinaya pīṭaka is said to be the basis of all since it contains the prātimokṣa precepts [sor sdom]. The vinaya is considered to be the representative of the Buddha [sangs rgyas kyi tshab] as well as the Buddha’s teaching. When we prostrate to a monk, we prostrate to the dharma as well as to the Buddha since the monk upholds the vinaya. We are also prostrating to the sangha as the monk is a member of the sangha. Accepting a prostration from a monk greatly diminishes one’s personal merit.

4) One should never eat the food of a practitioner who is staying in retreat, even if the retreatant offers the food. Retreatants are recipients of offerings and not donors of food. Since a retreatant strives for enlightenment in order to free all beings from suffering and establish them on the level of perfect enlightenment, his personal food is the food of all sentient beings. Taking food from a retreatant is as severe as taking food away from all sentient beings.

The eight perverse acts [log pa brgyad] are: 1) criticizing goodness [dkar phyogs la smad pa], 2) praising evil [nag phyogs la bstod pa], 3) interrupting or destroying the accumulation of merit of a virtuous person [dge ba can gyi tshogs bsags pa la bar du gcod cing tshogs bcag pa], 4) disturbing the minds of those who have devotion [dad pa can gyi thugs dkrugs pa], 5) giving up one’s master [bla ma spangs], 6) giving up one’s deity [lha spangs], 7) giving up one’s vajra brothers and sisters [mched lcams spangs] and 8) desecrating a sacred mandala [dkyil ’khor gnyan po dral].

1) Criticizing goodness means putting down virtue and virtuous conduct. Never speak badly about the benefits of virtue such as the ten virtuous actions, bodhicitta or the six transcendental perfections. Never say that such virtues are pointless or bring no results.

2) Avoid praising negativity and non-virtuous conduct such as praising a so-called hero who has killed many beings.

3) Never create obstacles for those who practice virtue and gather the accumulation of merit. Never prevent practitioners from practicing virtue.

4) Never upset the minds of the faithful by trying to destroy their faith and devotion. Never praise your own teacher in order to destroy the faith of other practitioners in their personal teachers. Never criticize or slander any teacher of the genuine dharma in order to destroy his student’s faith. This is crucial. A faithful mind is a mind infused with happiness. To destroy that kind of faith means to destroy a sentient being’s happiness, and this constitutes a root downfall for a bodhisattva. Only if a false guru is teaching a wrong path, a perverted form of dharma, is a bodhisattva allowed to prevent others from following such a teacher.

5) To give up one’s master means to say, “From now on this person is no longer my guru,” and to no longer regard that person as one’s teacher. This constitutes severing one’s connection to one’s guru. A student who receives the prātimokṣa precepts from a teacher is duty-bound to respect that teacher. If he instead abandons him, he is committing a serious mistake. When a student receives the bodhisattva precepts from a teacher and then abandons that teacher, his precepts will deteriorate [nyams pa]. A student who abandons his Vajrayāna master completely destroys all his tantric samayas.

All qualities that a student acquires from a teacher are based on the intimate relationship of cause [rgyu] and condition [rkyen]. The teacher is the condition for all dharma qualities that arise in the mind of the student, and the dharma that he has taught the student is the cause for these qualities to arise. The dharma is like the seed, and the teacher is like the soil, the water, and the sun. The seed will ripen only if planted in soil, irrigated with water, and warmed by the sun.

Abandoning the Buddha or one’s teacher means abandoning the conditions for attaining happiness [bde ba’i rkyen]. Abandoning the dharma means abandoning the causes for attaining happiness [bde ba’i rgyu]. Happiness here refers to the temporary happiness of the higher states of samsara, the happiness of liberation and the ultimate happiness of omniscience.

6) Giving up one’s meditation deity [yi dam] means giving up the dharma. To carry out the practice of a meditation deity means committing in one’s mind, “I will practice the meditation and recitation of this deity until I have reached the realization of this deity.” For example, you commit to meditate on the Bodhisattva Mañjushri until you have gained the realization of Mañjushri. This is your dharma path to enlightenment.

7) Giving up one’s vajra brothers and sisters means abandoning the sangha. Respecting one’s dharma friends and keeping harmony in the sangha is of utmost importance.

8) Desecrating a sacred mandala means violating the spiritual commitments, the samayas [dam tshig] for body, speech and mind of a particular tantric sādhana. For instance, if one practices the sādhana of a Mañjushri mandala, one must keep the spiritual commitments that go along with that practice. Keeping the commitments, one will progress swiftly. If one breaks the commitments, one will quickly advance to the three lower realms of samsara. The mandala is a sensitive, perilous and sacred object [yul gnyan po].

The five perverted ways of sustenance [log pa’i ‘tsho ba lnga] are: 1) obtaining something through pretentiousness [tshul ‘chos], 2) obtaining something through flattery [kha gsag], 3) obtaining something through hinting at it [gzhogs slong], 4) obtaining something through open theft [thob kyis ‘jal ba], and 5) obtaining something through calculated generosity [rmyed pas rmyed pa ‘tshol ba].

1) ‘Pretentiousness’ means trying to obtain food or donations from a sponsor by pretending to be something which one is not, or by pretending to have certain qualities which one does not have. 2) ‘Flattery’ means trying to obtain food or donations from a sponsor through speaking pleasant words that will delight the sponsor. 3) ‘Hinting’ means trying to obtain something that belongs to someone else by praising it. For instance, praising someone else’s watch with the expectation that it will be given. 4) ‘Open theft’ in this context means obtaining something that belongs to someone else by saying, “I need this,” and simply snatching it from its owner. 5) ‘Calculated generosity’ means presenting a small gift to the sponsor in hope of obtaining a large donation in return.

We have committed and accumulated in this and former lifetimes all these and many other forms of wrong-doing. We should confess it all right now since as our lifespan is diminishing. We begin to run out of time from the moment of our birth. Our lifespan decreases moment to moment, never increasing. This process of life dwindling away does not stop for even a second. Therefore, we must begin confession right now. When the time of death has come, even the king of all physicians, the Medicine Buddha [sangs rgyas sman pa’i rgyal po] in person, will not be able to help us. If death comes to everybody else, it will eventually also come to you, no matter whether you are powerful, rich, or highly realized. Nobody can escape death.

Text section 257:

Life runs out like a pond cut off from its water supply. Similarly, all sentient beings have set forth on the path toward death. This is a one-way street and no one can reverse this process. Nobody returns from death. Everything that is born will die. This fleeting life [glo bur tshe], as momentary as a lightning bolt in the night sky, is not something we can place our trust in. Thinking that this life is a happy and stable condition is utter foolishness. No wise person would place his trust in this fleeting life? Only fools do so.

Meditating correctly on the impermanence of life leads to a relaxed mind at ease. Such a person will use every remaining moment to practice the dharma and purify his mind. One who has really taken impermanence to heart is strongly inspired to practice and will not waste any time with pointless and harmful activities such as arguing, fighting and struggling, but will treat other beings only with love and kindness. A practitioner like this will be able to give victory to others and take defeat upon himself.

Text section 258 / stanza 40:

Stricken by disease, you lie on your deathbed. You might be surrounded by loving relatives and friends; you might have the best doctors and nurses treating you. Nevertheless, none of them will be able to help you. You alone will have to experience the harsh and unpleasant feeling of your life being severed. You alone will experience the successive dissolving of the elements [thim rim], and you alone will have to face the deluded perceptions of your bad karma. No one can relieve you from this suffering.
No sympathy offered by your relatives can change the fact that you are dying. No one among your relatives and physicians can give you proper guidance about how to face death. No one can help you cross over to the other side. You are alone and you will feel very helpless. Although your friends, relatives, doctors and nurses try to help the best they can, none of them can dispel your suffering or take your suffering upon themselves. You are left without protection.

Each being experiences his or her own personal happiness and suffering. This individual perception cannot be transferred to another. One’s personal experience comes about through one’s own former deeds. All ‘ordinary beings’ [so so skye bo]144 must experience their own individual karma [rang rang so so’i las so so myong dgos pa].
Accumulating various forms of karma individually distinct from one another, ordinary beings experience different fruitions of their actions. Ordinary beings lack the capacity to remove the suffering of other ordinary beings and certainly cannot protect other sentient beings from any suffering at the moment of death.

Text section 259 / stanza 41:

When you, someone habituated to negativity, enter the intermediate state [bar do], you will experience terrifying visions of persecution and abuse by the Mára of Death and his henchmen, beings with human bodies and animal heads. These deluded perceptions of the intermediate state, the bardo, are created by your own negative deeds and are personifications of your personal afflictions and habitual patterns. If your mind-stream is infested with negative thoughts and evil patterns, they will emerge at that time. Experiencing various frightening perceptions, you will not know how to protect yourself nor will your relatives and friends be able to help you at this point. Seeing no way out you feel totally desperate.

This stanza teaches that without overcoming your negative deeds and their fruitions through confession and dharma practice, you will inevitably face their negative consequences, the suffering of the three lower realms. When this time comes, the suffering is impossible to dispel. It is too late.

At the time of death only the dharma you have practiced will be of help. Only the meritorious and virtuous karma [bsod nams dge ba’i las] that you might have accumulated while still alive through the practices of going for refuge [skyabs su ‘gro ba], keeping pure discipline [tshul khrims], the seven branches [yan lag bdun pa] and so forth, will be able to help you now.

Although you have met the dharma and qualified teachers, although you have received the proper teachings, you failed to make use of your fortunate situation and did not practice. Now it is too late. Your life is ending. You are lying in your bed with just a tiny bit of life left in you. You breathe out for the last time, unable to breathe in again. Your mind panics and you encounter the frightening apparitions of the intermediate state, which are nothing other than the manifestations of the wicked deeds and negative patterns lying dormant in your mind. Now you feel regret for failing to practice while you were still alive. Now you understand that no external power can help you. You understand that the dharma—the virtue and merit you accumulated—are your only refuge. You had the chance to help yourself by practicing the dharma, but you did not do it.

144 ‘Ordinary beings’ [so so skye bo] are defined as ‘individualized beings’ because they move separately and distinctly from one another [tha dad so sor ‘gro bas na so so’i skye bo zhes bya’o].

Practicing the dharma means overcoming your afflictions. You can deal with your afflictions by not acting them out when they arise. You can remain like the trunk of a tree and keep your body, speech and mind still. Or you can transform your negative emotions into positive qualities such as compassion, love, kindness, devotion and so forth. Or, once you have received Secret Mantrayāna teachings, you might even know how to recognize your buddha nature when afflictions arise in your mind, letting them collapse within that recognition. Whatever method you have learned, you must practice as much as you can and remember it at all times and in all situations. Any of these different levels of practice can keep you from being overwhelmed when afflictions arise.

That capacity, the force that prevents you from being overwhelmed by afflictions, is called ‘merit’ [bsod nams]. The power to smooth out all disharmonious circumstances is called merit [mi mthun pa’i phyogs thams cad ‘jam thub pa zhig la bsod nams zer gi yod]. For instance, when great anger arises in your mind and you refrain from acting it out with body, speech or mind, but just remain still like the trunk of a tree, you have the merit to overcome this anger, this disharmonious situation. The shrāvakas deal with afflictions in this manner.

When anger arises in the mind of a bodhisattva, he establishes the view of egolessness. If he sees the afflictions arising in the mind of another, he generates compassion, thinking, “He is expressing his intense suffering through anger. He does not know the horrible consequence of anger nor does he know how to control and overcome his anger. How pitiful.” This is how bodhisattvas deal with afflictions.

A practitioner of Secret Mantrayāna recognizes the buddha nature directly as the essence of any afflictions that arise. Within that recognition all afflictions collapse, and wisdom arises. Both Mahāyāna practitioners and practitioners of Secret Mantrayāna know that afflictions fundamentally lack existence [gzhi ma grub pa]. All these methods to overcome afflictions are called ‘merit’ if one can apply them. The foremost task of a practitioner is to guard his mind against afflictions. As it is said in stanza 18 of chapter five of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra:

Except for the discipline of guarding one’s mind,
What is the use of many (other forms of) disciplines?
sems srung brtul zhugs ma gtogs pa
brtul zhugs mang po ci zhig bya

You need to build up the meritorious capacity to be able to deal with your afflictions. You practice the seven branches [yan lag bdun pa], bodhicitta, the six perfections and so forth, simply for this reason. Your merit and virtue will then be able to protect you and grant you refuge at the time of death, the time when your dharma practice is put to the ultimate test.

Text section 260 / stanza 42:

Now, as you are about to die, you cry out “Protectors!” [mgon po], calling upon the buddhas and bodhisattvas in desperation as your place of refuge [skyabs gnas]. Now you regret that you lived your life so heedlessly [bag med], unaware of the consequences of your actions. You had no faith of conviction in karma, the law of cause and effect [rgyu ’bras yid ches pa’i dad pa]. You were ignorant about what to do and what to avoid. You did not learn what is meant by virtue [dge ba] and non-virtue [mi dge ba]. You spent your life drinking sweet-tasting poison, never thinking about the terrible consequences. With your three gates [sgo gsum]—body, speech and mind—you acted heedlessly, committing many wicked deeds for the sake of this transient life.

You were unaware [ma ’tshal] that one suffering follows upon the next: first, the fear of being severed from life at the moment of death [’chi kha gnad gcod kyi ’jigs pa]; then, the horrors of the intermediate state after death [shi nas bar do’i ’jigs pa], where you experience the suffering of being caught and led away by the henchmen of Yama [gshin rje’i pho nya]; and finally, the terrors of the lower realms in the next life [phyi ma ngan songs gi ’jigs pa].

For the duration of your short life, you engaged in utterly pointless [snying po cung zad med pa] worldly activities. For insignificant aims you expended great effort. Having achieved your worldly goals, you find that they proved to be fruitless [’bras bu med], all hardship without result [ngal ba ’bras med]. Worldly aims are difficult to achieve [thob dka’], difficult to protect [srung dka’], and difficult to further [phel dka’]. Once achieved, they are easily lost. On top of all that, they do not guarantee long-lasting satisfaction. Whatever you have achieved, you will lose it again. In the end, it turns out to have been a pointless pursuit because everything falls under the power of impermanence [mi rtag pa]. The four limitations imposed by impermanence [mi rtag mtha’ bzhi] are:
The end of birth is death;
The end of hoarding is dispersal;
The end of gathering is separation;
The end of elevation is downfall.

Text section 261 / stanza 43:

A criminal being led away to be either mutilated or executed in public by order of the king will be petrified [bred par ’gyur te]. His mouth will be gaping [kha gdang] and dry [kha skams], and his glazed eyes cyanic blue [mig rtsa ngan pa gno che].146 The lustre will vanish from his face [bzhin mdangs nyams pa], and he will keep his head down [mgo ’phang dma’ ba] in fear, being downtrodden.

Since a person whose limbs are about to be amputated is already frightened to death, then how much more fear will he have facing the horrors of death? Criminals are led to the place of execution by their fellow humans, but at the moment of death we are led to the hell realms by the henchmen of Yama, who are not our fellow humans.

Just as criminals are petrified by their imminent mutilation, we will be petrified when clasped by the frightful messengers of Yama, the Lord of Death. While a criminal might be facing amputation of his hand, we will be facing the horrifying visions of the intermediate state and will be plagued by utter despair.

The demons [srin po; rakṣa] mentioned here are ‘man-eating demons’ [mi za mkhan gyi srin po]. Stricken with the disease of great panic [’jig chen nad kyis thebs gyur pa] indicates that at the moment of death one will be totally petrified with fear, unable to control one’s bladder and intestines, soiling oneself with excrement and urine.

Text sections 264-265 / stanzas 45 and 46:

In utter horror, eyes gaping, showing an expression of terror [bred sha thon pa],147 in fear [skyi bung / 'jigs skrag] and despair, we will search the four quarters for any help or refuge. We will be in such a state of shock that we cannot even close our eyes if we want to. Paralyzed by fear, our eyes are staring cyanic blue [mig rtsa sngo cer re gcer zhung].

Searching the four quarters and seeing no one to help us, we will become completely downtrodden and depressed [kun nas sans zhum zhi ngi mug par 'gyur ro]. What can we do if no one can help us? Even the Buddha will be unable to offer help.

Think about Devadatta, Buddha’s cousin. He had repeatedly committed extremely wicked deeds, crimes without retribution. At one point in time the earth broke open and Devadatta went alive—in his very body—down to the lowest hell realm, the avīci hell. Devadatta cried out in despair, “Gautama, I burn, I am ablaze, I am consumed by fire!” Even Buddha himself could do no more than teach him the dharma, saying, “Devadatta, from the bottom of your heart pray. Repeat this, ‘I go for refuge to the Buddha, I go for refuge to the dharma, I go for refuge to the sangha’.”

Buddha showered the same compassion and blessing on Devadatta as on his own son Rāhula. But even the Buddha cannot place beings on the level of liberation if they do not practice the dharma. Our practice of the dharma is our only refuge at the time of death. Since Devadatta took refuge to the three jewels as he went down to the avīci hell, he will remain there ‘only’ for one great aeon [bskal chen gcig]. After his karma in the avīci hell is exhausted, he will eventually become a pratyekabuddha.

Each of the four great guardian kings [rgyal chen bzhi] resides on the fourth terrace of Mount Meru, overlooking one of the four directions, and acting as a spiritual guide for one of the four quarters. Dhītarāṣṭa [yul 'khor srung] is the great Guardian King of the east [shar phyogs skyong ba'i rgyal chen] and has a retinue of gandharvas [dri za]. Virūdhaka ['phags skyes po] is the great Guardian King of the south [lho phyogs skyong ba'i rgyal chen] and has a retinue of kumbāndhas [grul bum]. Virūpākṣa [spyan mi bzang] is the great Guardian King of the west [nub phyogs skyong ba'i rgyal chen] and has a retinue of nāgas [klu]. Vāishravana [ram thos sras] is the great Guardian King of the north [byang phyogs skyong ba’i rgyal chen] and has a retinue of yakṣas [gnod sbyin].

Our continent, Jambudvīpa [’dzam gling / ’dzam bu’i gling], is on the southern side of Mount Meru and is, therefore, the domain of Virūdhaka. The south is also considered to be the direction of Yama, the Lord of Death [gshin rje]. Virūdhaka protects those who have led virtuous lives from the Lord of Death.

We have achieved a rebirth in Jambudvīpa, the most perfect place to practice the dharma. Moreover, we have attained the best possible physical body, the human body endowed with the eight freedoms and ten advantages. We have met a sublime Buddhist master, and we have received the dharma, through which we gained some understanding of what to do and what to avoid. We are in the fortunate position to be able to distinguish virtue and non-virtue. Many humans are completely ignorant about good and evil, having no idea about karma, the law of cause and effect. In spite of all these perfect conditions, we did not practice the dharma but instead committed negative deeds. Thus, we are unfortunate persons [skal chad po], cut off from the chance to gather merit.

As a practitioner, bring all this to mind. Meditate how it will be when you are about to die if you have not practiced the dharma. Remembering all your wicked deeds, imagine clearly that you are going to the three lower realms. These teachings by Shantideva and Paltrül Rinpoche must be practiced as meditation instructions on mindtraining [blo sbyong].

Remembering all the harm you have inflicted on other beings—your parents, relatives, friends and enemies, as well as animals, insects and so on—and weighing your virtue and non-virtue at the moment of death, you will discover that you lack virtue and are overloaded with abundant negativities. You will think, “Alas, I have failed. I will not fare well.” Your eyes will fill with tears; you will cover your chest with scratch marks; you face will turn bright blue; your breathing will become shaky and your legs and arms will tremble. With a mind filled with immense sadness, you will begin the great journey into your next life. Therefore, consider over and over again, “Wouldn’t it be better to practice now the dharma that will help me at the moment of death?”

Meditate until you feel the pain and anguish of the death experience. Until you truly experience the suffering of dying through your meditation practice, you cannot practice the dharma well. Contemplations like this that bring such experiences about are called ‘guidance into experience’ [myong khrid]. Visualize yourself as an evil-doer who is about to die. Experience the entire sequence of the moment of death—being fetched by the henchmen of the Lord of Death, entering the bardo, and finally taking rebirth in one of the three lower realms. Once you understand the devastating consequences of wrong-doing, you will actively remedy them through confession and dharma practice.

Remember all your negative mind-sets and feel true regret and shame about them. Feel in your heart that you have done wrong, that you have been really mistaken in committing all these negative deeds with body, speech and mind. Evoke all the buddhas and bodhisattvas, offer your heartfelt confession to them and ask for forgiveness. Spend a few minutes every day offering confession in this way. At the end, imagine the buddhas and bodhisattvas granting you absolution and think that your misdeeds are now purified. This thought is extremely important. Conclude with the thought, “I have confessed my misdeeds, the buddhas and bodhisattvas have absolved me, and I have promised to refrain from repeating the same negative actions. Now they have been purified.”

You need to know the proper way of practicing [sgrub stangs] the dharma. Even if you are a yogin living in a cave, this is nothing special; wild animals live in the wilderness all their lives without attaining enlightenment. Nor is staying in a retreat cell for a long time impressive in itself; prisoners spend many years incarcerated without making spiritual progress. In order to progress you must mingle the dharma with your mind.

A person who knows how to practice the dharma has the methods needed to purify his wicked deeds and negativity, while people unlearned in the dharma lack that knowledge. Therefore, knowing how to practice properly is more important than practicing intensely without knowledge [sgrub pa las sgrub stangs de gtsos che gi red]. As it is said:

Wickedness committed by the foolish, though minor, will be grave.
mkhas pa’i sdig pa che na’ang yangs blun po’i sdig pa chung’ang chen

Treat every day as if it were your last. The time, place and circumstances of your death are uncertain. Therefore, do not place your trust in this life, and waste your time with worldly activities. This sounds easy, but is very difficult to practice. This—the real teaching of the Buddha—is totally contrary to worldly life and means giving up all worldly activities, dropping out of ordinary life and spending your remaining time in contemplation and meditation. Of course, even practitioners must sustain themselves. However, having covered your basic needs, look for nothing further but dedicate yourself completely to practice.
Such dedication only arises if you have truly internalized the four contemplations that transform your mind [blo ldog mam pa bzhi]: (1) contemplation on the difficulty of obtaining the freedoms and advantages [dal 'byor myed par dka' ba], (2) contemplation on impermanence [tshen rtog pa], (3) contemplation on the defects of samsara ['khor ba'i nyes dmigs] and (4) contemplation on karma, the law of cause and effect [las rgyu 'bras]. These four contemplations turn your mind away from clinging to samsara as something meaningful. Once you have deeply understood in your heart that all sansāric activities are pointless, you have developed true renunciation [nges 'byung].

Understand three things: 1) you will certainly die, 2) the time of death is uncertain and 3) at the time of death nothing but the dharma can help you. 1) You will certainly die [nges par 'chi ba]. It is a natural law that whatever is born must die. Life is running out like the sun is setting in the west. From moment to moment your life is getting shorter like an animal being dragged to slaughter. Both the eighty-years-old and an infant less than a year are destined to die; at the most neither will reach more than one hundred years of age. This seems easy to grasp but the certainty of death is not readily taken to heart. 2) The time of death is uncertain [nam 'chi nges pa med pa]. Despite your youth and good health there is no guarantee you will not die soon. On what basis do you have the confidence that you will not die today?

You could only develop such confidence if the omniscient Buddha prophesied a certain length of life for you, or if you had undefiled higher perceptions that allowed you to know with certainty that you would not die for a set period of time. Such confidence could also arise if you had a meeting with the Lord of Death on a good day, and he told you, “I will not come to take you with me for such and such a period of time.”

The duration ['phen pa] of this life is like an arrow or like a butter lamp. The distance of an arrow shot depends on the pulling power of the archer, and the duration of a butter lamp depends on the amount of butter. You cannot be sure when the butter lamp will run out of butter—today, tomorrow, in the first half of the month, or in the latter half of the month. The time of your death is similarly uncertain. When your lifespan is finished, you will die. The Medicine Buddha himself has no medicine that prevents death. Even Amitayus, the Buddha of Longevity, has no power to extend your life indefinitely. Since even Vajrapani cannot protect you, you will die.

Although death caused by sudden circumstances can sometimes be prevented through rituals and the practice of virtue, you might still die prematurely, just as a butter lamp is easily extinguished by the wind. Thus, the lifespan of beings in Jambudvipa is uncertain. Death will find you, no matter where you are, no matter with whom you associate. No matter how much wealth and riches you possess, you cannot buy off death. Contemplate this repeatedly from the depth of your heart.

3) At the time of death nothing can help you [’chi ba’i dus gang gis mi phan pa]. Only the sublime dharma will be of use to you at the time of death. Neither your parents, your relatives, friends and beloved ones, nor anyone else will benefit you in any way. Nor will your riches. Unable to let go of your relatives, friends and riches, yet unable to care for them any longer, when the time comes you will embark on the great journey into the next life, naked and alone.

Your relatives will divide and share your wealth and you will take not so much as a needle. Yet the negative deeds you accumulated for the sake of your relatives and friends cannot be divided and shared with anyone else; instead, you alone will carry the burden of your negative deeds. Only the sublime dharma will be of benefit to you. Only the dharma can be your protector [mgon po], your refuge [skyabs], your island [gling], your resort [gnas], your support [dpung gnyen], your vision [snang ba], and your lamp [sgron me].

Therefore, create now the causes for dying without fear and regret. Make the firm commitment, “From now on I will exert myself exclusively in virtuous activities such as the practice of refuge, bodhicitta, the six transcendental perfections and so forth. From now on, I will abstain from committing any acts of non-virtue.”

The power of the support [rten gyi stobs] has two interpretations: 1) the supporting object for making confessions [bshags par bya’i yul gyi rten] and 2) the support through which to purify negative deeds [sdig pa dag bya’i rten]. In this context, the Khenpo Chöga’s Oral Explanations 289 power of support refers to the second interpretation, the support that functions as an object for purifying negative deeds. Text section 200 already described the power of the support as an object for confession [bshags yul].

Text section 270 / stanza 47:

Driven by fear of taking rebirth in the three lower realms, from now on we take refuge to the three jewels. This is the main topic of stanzas 47 and 48. The three jewels are the objects of refuge [skyabs yul] and also the support for confessing negativities [sdig pa bshags pa’i rten]. We rely on the three jewels as a support for purifying our wrongdoings. We seek refuge in the Buddha, the dharma and the sangha of the bodhisattvas. The buddhas and bodhisattvas, who are endowed with inconceivable qualities, wisdom, knowledge and supernatural powers, constantly help and care for others. To these sublime objects we go for refuge. From the first moment of receiving teachings on how to practice the sublime dharma until the attainment of complete enlightenment, we go for refuge.

Buddha is called the Victor because he is victorious over the enemy of the four māras [bdud bzhi'i dgra las rgyal bas rgyal ba]. Since he is a place of trust [yid brtan pa'i gnas] for all sentient beings, he is called the protector of all beings ['gro ba ma lus pa'i mgon po]. Having liberated himself from all fears, the Buddha has the capacity to protect others from their personal fears.

In the phrase all beings equal to the reaches of space [nam mkha' dang mnyam pa'i 'gro ba thams cad], the term ‘space’ is an example of something beyond count [grangs las 'das pa'i dpe], an example of something beyond boundaries [mtha' yas pa'i dpe], or an example of something beyond measure [tshad med pa'i dpe].

Thus, stanza 47 presents the jewel of the buddha [sangs rgyas dkon mchog].

The term superficial people [skye bo mdo shor ba] refers to ‘those who do what is unimportant’ [gal chung chung las] and thus ‘lose what is important’ [gal chen po shor ‘gro mkhan], or ‘those who have lost the main point’ [gnad 'gag shor 'gro mkhan].

A beginning bodhisattva must engage in study, contemplation and meditation. Although the knowledge of study [thos pa'i shes rab] comes easily, it also dissipates easily. If one contemplates the knowledge of study, practicing analytic meditation [dpyod bsgom], one will gain certainty [nges shes] about the dharma. This is the knowledge of contemplation [bsam pa’i shes rab]. One begins to see the truth of the dharma [bden pa mthong], the view [lha ba]. Even such certainty about the dharma cannot eradicate one’s own suffering, however. Scholars [mkhas pa] who have gone only this far in their dharma practice might still take rebirth in the hell realms. They might have gained heartfelt certainty in all the teachings, but if they are unable to liberate their afflictions they nevertheless carry the seeds of the lower realms in their mind-streams.

The knowledge of the dharma must be practiced in meditation. Once meditation has been well perfected, one will attain realization [rtogs pa], a knowledge that has realized egolessness [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab], the recognition of buddha nature. Only then will one be able to annihilate one’s own afflictions and suffering. Therefore, the practice tradition teaches:

Theoretical understanding wears out like patches.
Experiences fade away like haze,
But realization remains unchanging like space.

go ba lhan pa ’dra ste khog nas ’gro
rtogs pa nam mkha’ ’dra ste ’gyur ba med

To really practice the dharma properly, we must alternate between study, contemplation and meditation [thos bsam bsgom gsum ’dres mar byed dgos]. When the teacher is expounding the dharma to the student, his teaching style need not be eloquent [tshig sgrons snyan snyan] and full of scriptural quotations. He should focus primarily on the meaning rather than on impressive language. While teaching, he must apply what he teaches to his own mind. Applying the dharma while teaching is called meditation.
A beginning bodhisattva tries to develop bodhicitta to the best of his ability. Yet at times he forgets his noble motivations. Sometimes his old habitual patterns of afflictions come through and cloud his mind. This is utterly normal as long as the bodhisattva is an ‘ordinary being bodhisattva’ [so so skye bo byang chub sems dpa’]. However, a beginning bodhisattva should always strive to never be separated for long from bodhicitta.

At times a bodhisattva, while observing all precepts and trying his best to help others with a pure motivation, still feels that he is of no help at all. At that point keep in mind that even a buddha cannot help all sentient beings. The main activity of a beginning bodhisattva is to develop bodhicitta, to make aspirations for all sentient beings, to practice the six perfections, and to dedicate the merit of his dharma practice. When one’s own mind is liberated through realization [rtogs pas bdag grol], one will be able to liberate others through compassion [thugs rjes gzan grol]. To the extent one progresses in one’s practice, to the degree one’s own suffering is overcome, to that extent one will be able to benefit others.

Text section 276 / stanza 48:

After the Buddha had reached complete and perfect enlightenment under the Bodhi Tree [byang chub shing gi dbang po], sitting on the Vajra Seat [skr. vajrāsana] at Bodhgaya, he spoke:

I have found a nectar-like dharma
Which is profound, peaceful, free from complexity, luminous and uncompounded.
To whomever I teach it, it will not be understood.
Therefore, I will remain in the forest without teaching.

zab zhi spros bral ’od gsal ’dus ma byas bdud rtsi lta bu’i chos zhig bdag gis rnyed bdag gis bstan kyang go bar mi ’gyur pas mi smra nags ’dabs nyid du gnas par bya

Buddha had realized profound emptiness [zab mo stong pa nyid], buddha nature, the state of wisdom [ye shes]. It is called profound [zab pa] because it is not within the domain of worldly meditation ['jig rten pa’i bsgom pa’i yul ma yin] and is beyond all worldly concepts ['jig rten pa’i blo las ’das pa]. Since emptiness is non-dual [gnyis su med pa], it is peaceful [zhi ba]. Since emptiness is free from all thoughts [rtog pa med pa], it is without complexity [spros bral]. Since emptiness is immaculate knowledge [dri ma med pa’i mkhyen pa], it is luminous [’od gsal ba]. It is a knowledge free from the stains [dri ma] of the two obscurations, the obscuration of afflictions [nyon mongs pa’i sgrib pa; skr. kleshāvarana] and the obscuration of cognition [shes bya’i sgrib pa; jñeyāvarana]. Since emptiness is free from arising, ceasing and abiding [skye dgag gnas gsum dang bral ba], it is uncompounded [’dus ma byas].

Text section 277 / stanza 48:

Buddha has realized [thugs su chud pa] or understood [thugs su mkhyen pa] all dharmas, the ‘dharma of profound emptiness’ [zab pa stong pa nyid gyi chos] and the ‘vast dharma of the levels and paths’ [rgya che ba sa dang lam gyi chos]. The dharma he has taught is comprised of the dharma of statements [lung gi chos] and the dharma of realization [rto gs bya]. The ‘dharma of statements’ refers to the statements of the tripitaka [lung sde snod gsum], and the ‘dharma of realization’ is the path of the three precious trainings [rto gs bya chos lam bslab pa gsum], which are: 1) the training in discipline [tshul khrims kyi bslab pa], 2) the training in samādhi [ting ne’i ’dzin gyi bslab pa] and 3) the training in knowledge [shes rab kyi bslab pa]. Thus, with the first two lines of stanza 48, Shantideva has shown the jewel of the dharma [chos dkon mchog].

If one grasps the meaning of just one stanza,
This constitutes the doctrine of statements.
If one gives rise to a virtuous mindset for just one instant,
This constitutes the doctrine of realization.

tshigs bcad gcig gi don shes na
de ni lung gi bstan pa yin dge sems skad cig skyes pa na de ni rtogs pa’i bstan pa yin.

The dharma of statements is to understand what is meant by a noble mindset [bsam pa bzang po] and the dharma of realization is to give birth to a noble mindset. Therefore, the simplest way of defining the teaching of the Buddha is to say it is a noble mindset.

Those who have realized the wisdom of egolessness [bdag med rtogs pa’i shes rab mgon du gyur mkhan] are called ‘noble beings’ [’phags pa]. This realization begins on the first bodhisattva level, which corresponds to the path of seeing [mthong lam]. These bodhisattvas cannot return to the delusion of ego-clinging [bdag ’dzin]. Therefore, the assembly of the bodhisattvas [byang chub sems pa’i tshogs] is called the noble sangha of nonreturners [’phags pa phyir mi ldog pa’i dge ’dun]. Thus, with the second two lines of stanza 48, Shantideva has presented the jewel of the sangha [dge ’dun dkon mchog].

Frightened by the three kinds of suffering, which are nothing other than the ripening of my own wicked deeds, I offer myself to Bodhisattva Samantabhadra, who is said to be the embodiment of the aspirations of all the buddhas [smon lam gyi rang gzugs]. He is one of the eight senior sons [sras kyi thu bo brgyad] of the Buddha, one of the eight great bodhisattvas. I also offer my body to Mañjughoṣa [’jam pa’i dbyangs], who is said to be the embodiment of the wisdom of the buddhas [ye shes kyi rang gzugs].

If we call upon the buddhas and bodhisattvas it must be with sincerity. Only when we sincerely wish to eliminate our negative deeds, if we are truly frightened by the consequences of our former karma, should we call upon them for help. Lacking such genuine fear, one should not call upon the buddhas and bodhisattvas.

Khenpo Kunpal’s intention to teach skillfully sometimes leads to phrases like the mind of the buddhas would be disappointed [de dag gi thugs kyang khrel bar ’gyur ro]. In reality, however, no buddha would ever become disappointed with any sentient being. As it is said in the sutras:
The buddhas are endowed with a loving mind;
They are never upset with sentient beings.

Text section 279 / stanza 50:

Text sections 279 through 281 explain the special qualities of Bodhisattva Avalokita [spyan ras gzigs] or Avalokiteshvara [spyan ras gzigs dbang phyug]. From the time he first developed bodhicitta he has striven exclusively for the benefit of others, without even the slightest trace of attachment to self-centered interests [rang ‘dod kyi ‘khri ba].151

Text section 280 / stanza 50:

The Buddha gazes constantly on all sentient beings. With his great compassion he ceaselessly guards and cares for sentient beings day and night. Not even for a single moment is there any interruption or bias to the unlimited compassion of the Buddha. Avalokiteshvara, also called ‘the one who never closes his eyes’ [mig mi ’dzum pa], is the personification of Buddha’s compassion [snying rje’i rang gzugs]. From the depth of your heart, cry out to Avalokiteshvara, letting out a great wailing [pho chen po btab ste] or letting out a strong lamentation with mournful crying [nyams thag ngo ros ’o dod drag pos ’bod pa]: “Please help me, the great evildoer! Please grant me refuge from my fear that I will go to the three lower realms the very moment I die.”

Text section 281-282 / stanza 50:

I have committed the ten non-virtuous actions with my body, speech and mind. Among them, three are committed through the body: taking life [srog gcod pa], taking what is not given [ma byin par len pa], and sexual misconduct [log gyem]. Four are committed by means of speech: speaking lies [rdzun smra ba], sowing discord [phra ma byed pa], harsh words [tshig rtsub] and worthless chatter [ngag kyal]. Three are committed through mind: covetousness [rnab sems], wishing harm to others [gnod sems] and wrong views [log lta].

You must understand that samsara is created by your own thoughts. Thoughts spring from ego-clinging [bdag ’dzin], holding on to the dichotomy of ‘I’ and ‘others’. Ego-clinging is based on ignorance [ma rig pa]. The moment you hold on to an ‘I’ you have created the ‘other’, setting in motion the endless chain of labeling everything as belonging to ‘me’ or to ‘others’. Based on ignorance you give rise to afflictions, thereby accumulating karma. Once karma has been created and accumulated, you will inevitably have to endure the consequences of your actions. Our negative actions have led us into perpetual [rgya ’byams], continuous [rgyun chad med pa] or endless [mtha’ med pa] delusion. Thus, thoughts [rnam rtog], primarily ignorance [ma rig pa], are called the great demon [gdon chen].

Therefore, acknowledge your negative deeds and bad actions for what they are and confess them. Use all these buddhas and bodhisattvas as the support to confess and purify your wicked deeds. Cry out with a lamenting voice, “Please protect me, the most wicked one!” Cry out with strong devotion to Avalokiteshvara for help so that he may grant you protection. Taking refuge, going for the protection of Avalokiteshvara in this manner purifies negative deeds and accumulates virtue.

Text section 283 / stanza 51:

Generally, Ākāśagarbha [nam mkha’i sning po] is considered the personification of the Buddha’s blessings [byin rlabs kyi rang gzugs]. A beginning bodhisattva must learn what the bodhisattva precepts are, and should keep them even at the cost of his life. If, however, he commits any of the downfalls [ltung ba] or root downfalls [rtsa ltung], he must immediately confess them to Bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha. Among the eight great bodhisattvas, Ākāśagarbha is the one who especially cares for the beginning bodhisattvas who have committed any downfalls in their bodhisattva precepts.

Therefore, one should offer prostrations and present offerings to him. The Ākāśagarbha-śūtra [nam mkha’i sning po’i mdo] says that a beginning bodhisattva should call out to the Bodhisattva Ākāśagarbha every morning at dawn.

In general, Bodhisattva Kṣitigarbha [sa yi sning po] is considered the personification of the Buddha’s merit [bsod nams rang gzugs] and he especially cares for those monks and fully ordained monks who have broken or lost their precepts because they were overwhelmed by too many afflictions.

A mere imitation of a monk [btsun gzugs] is someone who looks or dresses like a monk [grva pa] but who does not behave like one, rather acting as someone who enacts all kinds of afflictions [nyon mongs ’chol nyog tu spyod pa].152 A real monk [btsun pa]153 is

153 Dictionary: btsun pa means grva pa or bande. btsun pa has the connotation of clean [gtsang ma], clean in regard to the conduct of body, speech and mind. Whoever observes the precepts of individual liberation, the precepts of the bodhisattvas or the samayas of Secret Mantra is clean in body, speech and mind. Someone who does not observe at least the ten virtuous actions is considered unclean [btsog pa] in body speech and mind.

someone who is peaceful and tame in his conduct of body, speech and mind [sgo gsum gyi kun spyod zhi zhang dul ba] and who has abandoned all negative conduct.

You also call upon Maitreya and all the other great bodhisattvas of the tenth level, asking them to help you. The countless buddhas and bodhisattvas have the aspiration and the compassion to help you, to grant you refuge. They also have the capability to do so. All you need do is call upon them, cry out to them and ask for their help. To cry out in lamentation ['o dod bod pa] means to cry out loudly, “Buddhas and bodhisattvas of the ten directions, look upon me, the miserable evildoer. From the depth of my heart I cry out to you in lamentation. Please protect me from my bad karma. Please purify the evil deeds that I have accumulated since beginningless time, from lifetime to lifetime. Look upon me with kindness and compassion, and enable me to purify my evil karma.”

Text section 284 / stanza 52:

The glorious Guhyapati [dpal gsang ba'i bdag po], the Lord of Secrecy, and Vajrī, the ‘one who has a vajra’ [rdo rje can], are all epithets of Bodhisattva Vajrapāni [phyag na rdo rje]. Just as the son of an enemy whom I have killed will come after me to take revenge, his mind full of anger and aggression, the henchmen of Yama, the Lord of Death, come after me with minds as hateful as if I were the red-handed killer of their fathers [pha bsad kyi lag dmar ltar].

Text section 285 / stanza 52:

The sūtras report that each of the one thousand buddhas of the Fortunate Aeon will have two assistants. The first assistant is the bodhisattva Vajrapāni [phyag na rdo rje], who will always preserve and protect the complete teachings of the thousand buddhas [sangs rgyas stong gi bka' sdus ba po]. He is able to hear and retain the complete teachings of every buddha in their entirety. The second assistant is the god Brahmā [shangs pa], who requests each of the thousand buddhas to turn the wheel of dharma. The one thousand buddhas and their two assistants are called the ‘one thousand and two’ [stong rtsa gnyis].

Furthermore, the sūtras relate that from the moment the buddhas of the three times first developed bodhicitta, attained enlightenment and set the wheel of dharma in motion until they finally entered into nirvāṇa, Vajrapāni acted as their bodyguard [sku srung]. When Khenpo Kunpal says Vajrapāni is guarding or looking out [mel tshe byed pa] for all the buddhas, it means he is personifying the self-protecting power of the buddhas.

Buddhist mythology relates that Vajrapāni splits into a hundred pieces the heads of all demonic ones [ma rungs ba] who cause any harm to Buddha’s body, speech and mind. What this actually means is that Buddha destroys sentient being’s wrong concepts [rtog pa ngan pa]. Buddha’s power splits the head of ego-clinging [bdag dzin gyi mgo ‘gem par mdzad pa] into one hundred pieces. The Buddha would never cause any sentient being to be harmed.

Since protective powers are ascribed to Vajrapāni, retreatants [mtshams pa] even now begin their retreats by practicing the recitation and meditation on Vajrapāni in order to remove all obstacles. When moving into retreat, retreatants set up the ‘standard of the kings’ [rgyal tho] next to the door outside their retreat hut. In particular, when they enter into a recitation retreat of a wrathful deity, the standard should depict Vajrapani with the ‘four great guardian kings’ [rgyal chen rigs bzhi] or a flaming Tibetan letter HUNG on a lotus, moon and sun seat. For a recitation retreat of a peaceful deity, the standard should depict a five-pronged vajra on a lotus, moon and sun seat or a picture of the four guardian kings alone.

As human beings we each have a birth divinity [lhan skyes kyi lha] and a ‘birth demon’ [lhan skyes kyi ‘dre] who accompany us from the time of birth. The birth divinity is the personification of one’s merit [bsod nams kyi rang gzugs kyi lha], and the birth demon is the personification of one’s negative deeds [sdig pa’i rang gzugs kyi lha]. Practicing considerable virtue [dge ba] strengthens the birth divinity, while undertaking many negative deeds strengthens the birth demon. Vajrapāni protects and follows the buddhas and bodhisattvas like a birth divinity. As all the eight great bodhisattvas are personifications of Buddha’s qualities, they remain at all times inseparable from him.

Vajrapāni’s residence on the northern side of Mount Meru is called Ałakāvatī [lcang lo can]. There he is surrounded by hosts of yakṣas [snod sbyin]. As a yakṣa, he is called Guhyaka, the ‘Secretive One’ [gsang ba pa]. Since he is Lord of the Yakṣas, he is also called Yakṣa Vajrapāni [snod sbyin lag na rdo rje].

According to the extraordinary Secret Mantra, the buddhas empowered [dbang bskur] and authorized [mnga’ gsol] Vajrapāni as the personification of the vajra mind of all victors [rgyal ba thams cad kyi thugs rdo rje’i rang gzugs], as the lord of all inconceivable secrets of their body, speech and mind. As a symbol of that empowerment [dbang rtags] he holds a vajra, signifying that he holds all the secret instructions [man ngag] and tantras [rgyud] of body, speech and mind of all the buddhas. Thus, he is the one who holds all teachings of Secret Mantra [gsang sngags kyichos thams cad bzung mkhan], and he is the ‘compiler of all tantras’ [rgyud thams cad kyi bka’ sdus ba po].

A Mahāyāna practitioner should rely on a meditation deity, a yidam [yi dam]. This could be any one of the bodhisattvas, such as the Lords of the Three Families [rigs gsum mgon po]—Mañjushrī, Avalokiteshvara and Vajrapāni—or any other male or female buddha or bodhisattva one feels devotion to. A practitioner should receive the empowerment for that meditation deity from a qualified master. Without having received the empowerment, even practicing the recitation and meditation of a particular meditation deity will not bring any results. In addition, one needs detailed instructions on how to meditate on that deity and how to perform the recitation of the particular mantra.

If you practice diligently the meditation and recitation of your yidam deity, it will appear either in person, in a vision or in a dream. Once you have met the deity, it will manifest at the time of death and guide you through the experience of death and the intermediate state, leading you to liberation. This instruction is called ‘recollecting the meditation deity’ [yi dam rjes su dran pa] and is a crucial instruction within the teachings on bardo, the intermediate state.

One single yidam deity is sufficient [lha gcig chog ma]. Consider this single meditation deity to be the essence of all buddhas and bodhisattvas. Do not think that when you practice Vajrapāni as your main yidam you are neglecting Mañjushrī. Understand that your yidam incorporates all buddhas and bodhisattvas. A meditation in which all buddhas are embodied in one single meditation deity is called the ‘tradition that incorporates all jewels’ [kun ‘dus nor bu lugs]. If a sūtra practitioner prefers a more elaborate practice style, then one may designate Buddha Shakyamuni as the guru practice [bla ma], either Mañjushrī, Avalokiteshvara or Vajrapāni as the yidam practice [yi dam], and Tārā as the dākinī practice [mkha’ ’gro].

Now, go with regret in your heart for refuge to the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Realizing that you were wasting your life when you ignored the instructions and teachings [bsgo zhirng bka’ stsal ba las ‘das pa] of the buddhas and bodhisattvas to practice virtue and avoid non-virtue, you see the great horrors of the moment of death, the intermediate state and the lower realms in your next life ahead of you, and you take refuge to the buddhas and bodhisattvas with heartfelt conviction. You supplicate the buddhas and bodhisattvas, “Please consider me with your compassion so that I will be able to liberate myself from all the negative deeds that I have committed in this and all former lifetimes.” Calling upon the Buddha, the eight great bodhisattvas and the sixteen arhats so that they liberate you from your bad karma is called ‘the power of the support’ [rten gyi stobs]. The Buddha, bodhisattvas and arhats have promised to help us sentient beings. All we need do is call out to them.

Text sections 289-290:
The power of the applied antidote [gnyen po kun tu spyod pa’i stobs] is the power of actually practicing or relying on an antidote. The chapters on heedfulness [bag yod], introspection [shes bzhin] and patience [bzod pa]—the fourth, fifth and sixth chapters of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra—teach in detail how to apply the antidote to one’s negativity.

‘Heedfulness’ means to be careful about what to do and what to avoid [blang dor gyi gnas la g zab gz ab byed pa]. ‘Introspection’ [shes bzhin] means analyzing oneself, checking one’s responses to any given situation. You check to see whether or not your behavior is in accord with dharma. You check to see whether your conduct is noble [bzang po] or reprehensible [ngan pa]. ‘Patience’ is considered the greatest austerity [dka’ thub] for a practitioner.

Stanzas 54-65 teach the antidote to one’s wicked deeds in the framework of confession. In this context, how do you actually confess your evil deeds? The method of counteracting negativity and its cause is called the ‘power of the applied antidote’. Just as an antidote for sickness is medicine, the antidote for aggression [zhe sdang] is the practice of kindness [byams pa] and so forth.

You need to develop the power of the applied antidote in order to purify your mind from the stains of your negative deeds. You must do this for yourself; no one else can purify your wicked deeds. All your positive and negative deeds are created by yourself. You yourself have committed them, and you yourself need to purify them. Your mind creates positive and negative intentions, and your body and speech carry them out. Understand that when you undertake purification practices such as confession, prostrations, offerings and so forth, it is mainly your mental attitude that renders such practices beneficial. If you reduce them to mere physical exercises or lip service, they do not work. Body and voice are merely the tools; your mind is the most important factor.

On a gross level, any thought, emotion, word or action deriving from a harmful or negative intention is called a negative deed [sdig pa] or non-virtuous action [mi dge ba]. Any thought, emotion, word or action springing from a beneficial and helpful attitude is called a virtuous action [dge ba].

The practice of the power of the antidote for negative deeds consists of three parts: the preparatory part [sbyor ba], the main part [dngos gzhi] and the concluding part [rjes]. The preparatory part [sbyor ba]: First of all you should repeatedly reflect on karma, the law of cause and effect, and on impermanence. You need to gain conviction and confidence [nges shes] in these. If you lack understanding of the law of cause and effect, you will not understand the consequences of your negative deeds or the need to purify them, and you will not understand why practicing goodness is so important. A heartfelt understanding of karma, the law of cause and effect, is therefore said to be the correct view for a worldly person [’jig rten pa’i yang dag pa’i lta ba]. Someone who has understood the law of cause and effect will naturally [rang shugs] practice goodness and avoid wrong-doing. He will never go to the three lower realms but will proceed from happy state to happy state.

Without a heartfelt understanding of impermanence, you will not appreciate the need to practice confession right away. Only by reflecting on impermanence will you understand the fragile and fleeting nature of your present existence. Having truly understood impermanence, you will no longer waste your time with useless activities but will only practice the dharma.

The main part [dngos gzhi]: You recall all your negative deeds, and develop regret for them. Feeling remorse, you ask for forgiveness. You feel no joy about your wrongdoing but only regret. Bringing all of your negativity out in the open, you acknowledge what you have done, and that it was wrong. You distance yourself from your former actions. This main part is the actual practice of confession endowed with the four powers.

The concluding part: You dedicate all the merit accumulated in this and all former lifetimes in order to purify your negative deeds. Moreover, you formulate the strong and unshakeable resolve not repeat these negative actions and patterns in the future. In the preparatory part, practice all virtue with the intention of confessing your wicked deeds. In the main part, earnestly recollect and confess your negativity. Visualize the object of confession, the buddhas and bodhisattvas, and confess. Imagine that light rays are emitted by the buddhas and bodhisattvas and purify your wrong-doing like the morning sun evaporates dew. Develop the strong confidence that your negative deeds have been completely purified. In conclusion, dedicate the merit of your practice for the purpose of purifying your negative deeds. In this way apply the preparatory, main and concluding parts of your practice to the elimination of negativity. As this is a Mahāyāna practice, think that you are purifying the wicked deeds of both yourself and all sentient beings.

Text sections 291:

Even if you spent your entire life in retreat and committed only very minor mistakes, such as getting angry at a mouse that ate your retreat provisions, you would still need to confess these tiny misdeeds. Unless you confess them, you will eventually experience their fruition. A mere life of virtue does not automatically purify former negativity, which will still ripen unless confessed.

In the sūtra tradition, you confess to the buddhas and bodhisattvas, bring all your misdeeds out in the open, and pray that they may be purified. The real antidote to negative deeds is, however, the practice of virtue. While recalling your misdeeds you must also practice virtue [sdig pa la dmigs nas dge ba sgrub dgos]. When any practice of virtue is embraced by the preparatory, main and concluding parts of confession practice, as explained above, staying in retreat will purify one’s negativities.

This instruction is especially important for beginners, who are not able to practice nondefiling virtue [zag med pa’i dge ba], the recognition of buddha nature. Even those who have glimpses of buddha nature, should still continue to practice by means of defiling virtue [zag bcas kyi dge ba]. ‘Defiling virtue’ [zag bcas kyi dge ba] is a virtuous deed, such as refraining from killing, stealing, lying, sexual misconduct, taking intoxicants and so forth, not embraced by conventional or absolute bodhicitta. ‘Non-defiling virtue’ [zag med gyi dge ba] is a virtuous deed embraced by absolute bodhicitta [don dam sens bskyed].

In the tantra tradition, you visualize Vajrasattva above your head, and imagine a stream of pure nectar pouring down, washing away all your negativity. While in the sūtra tradition, the antidote to your evil deeds consists of the preparatory part, the main part and the concluding part, in the tantra tradition you apply visualizations [dmigs pa]. In both traditions, after you have completed your confession, you must make the resolve not to repeat your negative actions. Finally, you need to develop the confidence that your evil deeds have been truly purified. At best, you should then rest in the primordially pure essence [ngo bo ye dag].

The famous practitioner Sonam Namgyal [bsod nams rnam rgyal], who attained the rainbow body, had been a great evildoer and tough guy before becoming a dharma practitioner. To purify his negative karma, his teacher, the Fifth Dzogchen Rinpoche, Tubten Chökyi Dorje [thub bstan chos kyi rdo rje], made him repeat the Longchen Nyingthig preliminary practices [sngon ’gro] more than thirty times. In addition, he had him carve a mani stone for every sentient being he had killed. He had to carve the shape of each animal he had killed on the mani stone. In this way, he made his confessions, practicing virtue, while bringing each of his wrongdoings to mind. Later, he received the teachings on ‘Cutting Through’ [khregs chod] and ‘Direct Crossing’ [thod rgal] and stayed many years in the mountains in seclusion. In 1952 he achieved the rainbow body [’ja’ lus].

Without purifying our negative deeds through confession, even should we attain the level of an arhat, we would still have to experience the fruition of our previous actions. Angulimāla [sor mo phreng ba] was such an arhat who experienced the ripening of his wicked deeds after he had attained arhatship. As long as one’s heavy negative deeds have not been purified through confession, the wisdom of the path of seeing [mthong lam gyi ye shes], the first bodhisattva level cannot be attained. As it is said: “When our obscurations are purified, realization will dawn naturally” [sgrub pa dag na rtogs pa ngang gis shar]. Once we have become arhats or bodhisattvas dwelling on the bodhisattva levels, we will no longer even be able to commit wicked deeds.

Even virtuous people [dge ba can], who practice ‘defiling virtue’ [zag bcas kyi dge ba], i.e., virtue that is not embraced by either conventional or absolute bodhicitta, might still take rebirth in the lower realms. Since your previous negativity might outweigh your virtuous deeds of this life, there is no certainty that the practice of defiling virtue by itself will lead you to rebirth in the higher realms. The causes for rebirth in the lower realms remain in your mind-stream [rgyud] even if you practice only virtue in this life. To prevent this from happening, a practitioner must purify his mind-stream through confession.

Especially on the verge of death [chi kha’i mtshams sbyor], you need to be very careful to prevent negative thoughts and emotions from arising in your mind-stream. Your state of mind at the very instant of death determines your next rebirth. Negative thoughts and intentions at that moment sabotage your chances for a good rebirth. Tradition tells the story of a monk who led a virtuous life and became very rich. Very attached to his money, he hid it in the wall of his room and could not let go of this attachment even at the moment of death. It is said that he took rebirth as a tiny insect on the money hidden in the wall.

The karmic force that begins an action is called ‘impelling karma’ [phan byed gyi las] and the karmic force that completes an action is called ‘completing karma’ [rdzogs byed 154 1872-1935 gyi las]. Like the monk in the last story, while virtue might dominate your actions as the initial impelling force, their completing force might be negative [phan byed dge bas ’phangs kyang rdzogs byed sdig pas rdzogs pa].

Another story tells of a virtuous person in ancient India who had accumulated enough merit to be reborn in the god realms. However, as he was very attached to his elephant even at the moment of his death, he took rebirth as the god Indra’s elephant in the god realms. One’s mental state at the moment of death has a tremendous impact on the next life. Despite the accumulation of considerable virtue, if you stray into a wicked mind state [sdig sems] as you are dying, you will take rebirth in the lower realms. These stories illustrate the great importance of virtuous ‘completing karma’ at the end of any action and especially at the end of one’s life. On the verge of death you need to know where to direct yourself [gang la mtshams sbyor shes pa] and how to lead your mind through the intermediate state, the bardo, into the next life.

Text section 293 / stanza 54:
Stanza 54 uses the example of disease to demonstrate why confession is necessary as an antidote to wicked deeds. When stricken by a common disease you follow the advice of a physician who tells you how to cure your disease. You even willingly undergo hardships such as bloodletting [gtar ba], being burned [bsreg pa] with moksha [me btsa’] or a red-hot iron, or undergoing acupuncture [phug pa] with a golden needle [gser khab] and so on.

You should however be much more concerned about the great terminal disease of afflictions [nyon mongs pa’i gong nas chen po] with which you have been stricken since beginningless time. This disease will certainly lead you to the suffering of the lower realms. This disease of afflictions is infinitely more difficult to heal than any ordinary physical disease.

Only when you heed the advice of the supreme physician, the Buddha, and pay attention to what should be done and what should be avoided, will you escape the three lower realms. No ordinary disease consigns you to the lower realms; only your wicked deeds, your involvement in desire, aversion, ignorance and other afflictions, does so. Afflictions cause negative deeds and bad karma. Your bad karma leads you to rebirth in the lower realms. The only medicine that will cure you is the precious dharma administered by the Buddha. Thus, understand that the disease of afflictions is infinitely more dangerous than any ordinary disease. Understand as well that the dharma, the method to cure the disease of afflictions, is very difficult to obtain.

Text sections 294 / stanza 55:

In stanza 55 Shantideva compares afflictions to infectious diseases that lead all people to the lower realms. For instance, if one hundred beings generate anger toward a bodhisattva, a very sensitive and perilous object, all one hundred will take rebirth in the hell realm. Therefore, infection by even a single affliction plants the cause for rebirth in the hell realm.

Disease-stricken people must rely on the advice of a physician. Similarly, sentient beings, infected by afflictions, should follow the advice of the Buddha. The dharma teaches the methods for eradicating the diseases of afflictions and for preventing the consequences of afflictions, the suffering of the lower realms. Buddha’s teachings can completely eliminate all forms of suffering, physical as well as mental. Buddha has identified suffering and also the causes of suffering. He has taught the path out of suffering. Even if you searched the entire world, you would not find no method superior to the dharma for curing the disease of afflictions.

In this regard [de la], meaning in regard to the method that can heal all these diseases of afflictions, follow the advice of the Buddha, the supreme physician. Do not act foolishly like someone stricken by a disease who refuses to follow his doctor’s advice. If you follow the advice given by the Buddha and practice the dharma well, then the Buddha lauds you, “Well done, child of noble family” [legs so rigs kyi bu]. But if we fail to practice the dharma, but instead engage in non-virtuous conduct, then, since we are bringing harm upon ourselves, we are extremely ignorant.155 Thus, we become an object of criticism [smad pa’i gnas]156 of the Buddha, who says, “You will not fare well.” Furthermore, if you ignore the advice of the Buddha and commit negative actions, your protective deities [bsrug skyob kyi lha], your birth divinities [lhan cig skyes pa’i lha], will leave you.

Text section 296:

Someone who would use a golden vessel to clean up excrement would be considered stupid. Someone who uses a precious human rebirth to commit wicked deeds must be considered even far more stupid. Such a person is not aware of the difficulties of obtaining a human body nor is he aware of the consequences of wicked deeds. Moreover, such a person is not aware that the precious human body is the perfect vehicle for attaining liberation and omniscience.

Text section 297

The physican Jivaka-kumāra [tsho byed gzhon nu], who was considered the greatest physican of his time, was recognized as such three times by the kings of Magadha, 155 ‘Ignorant’ [gti mug] connotes delusion or dullness, an ignorance that is dull and dark. The term ma rig pa, which is also translated as ‘ignorance’, connotes ‘not knowing’ [ha ma go ba], the ‘absence of awareness’.

156 Khenpo Chöga observes that to translate this phrase with ‘object of scorn’ or ‘worthy of scorn’ would be too strong since a buddha harbors no such feelings toward any sentient being. See Minyak Kunzang, page 91: [gti mug can dam pa rnams kyis ches cher smad par bya ‘os pa’i gnas su gyur pa]. See also Sazang, page 92: [gti mug can dam pa rnams kyis smad par bya ba’i gnas yin no].

twice by King Bimbisāra [gzugs can snying po] and once by Ajātashatru [ma skyes dgra]. As result he became very proud and could not see the truth of the dharma. To teach him humility, Buddha took Jivaka-kumāra to the Himavant mountains [ri bo gangs ldan],157 pointed out all the medicinal plants, taught him how to prepare them, and explained which diseases they cured. Since Jivaka-kumāra knew nothing of this, his pride was humbled.158

Buddha Shakyamuni also taught for four years the four tantras of the medical sciences in the celestial realm of the thirty-three [skr. trayastrinsha], on top of Mount Meru. There, surrounded by four mountains—Mt. Vindhyā [ri bo 'bigs byed] to the south, Mt. Himavant [ri bo gangs can] to the north, Mt. Gandhamādana [ri bo spos ngad ldan] to the east and Mt. Malaya [ri bo ma la ya] to the west—amidst a wondrous forest of medicinal trees, is the city of medicine called Sudarshana [sman gyi grong khyer lta na sduŋ], where Buddha Shakyamuni manifested as the Medicine Buddha, Buddha Bhaiṣajyaguru [sangs rgyas sman bla], residing in a palace.

Bhaiṣajyaguru in turn, emanated the sage Vidyajñāna [drang srong rig pa’i ye shes] and the sage Manasija [drang srong yid las skyes]. In response to sage Manasija’s questions, sage Vidyajñāna taught the ‘four medicine tantras’ [sman gyi rgyud bzhi]. The audience consisted of the four-fold retinue: 1) the retinue of gods [lha’i ‘khor], 2) the retinue of sages [drang srong gi’ khor], 3) the retinue of non-Buddhist divinities [phyi pa’i ‘khor] and 4) the retinue of Buddhists [nang pa’i ‘khor]. Among the latter was also the great Indian physician Jivaka-kumāra.

It is generally considered that the collective karma, positive as well as negative, of sentient beings causes various kinds of diseases and their medicinal antidotes to manifest in this world. Only the Buddha in his infinite knowledge, however, can identify the correct antidote for each disease.

Text section 298 / stanza 57:

Being careless about your conduct and continuing to accumulate wicked deeds, you will surely fall into the hell realms in the next life. At this time, when you think about the results of your negativity, you understand why you should quickly purify your mind through confession. If you want to avoid suffering in the lower realms, purify the causes for going there. The causes for a rebirth in the lower realms are your negative mindset [bsam pa ngan pa], your wicked deeds [sdig pa], and your nonvirtuous actions [mi dge ba’i las]. Understand that you must overcome the habitual patterns of committing negative deeds. With a sincere belief in karma, the law of cause and effect, you will try to the best of your ability to discontinue your negative deeds and aspire to virtue.

159 The four medicine tantras are: 1) the root tantra [rṭsa rgyud], 2) the exegetical tantra [bshad rgyud], 3) the instructional tantra [man ngag rgyud] and 4) the subsequent tantra [phyi ma’i rgyud].

Buddhist cosmology teaches that the hell realms begin with the reviving hell, twenty thousand leagues [dpag tshad] below the surface of Jambudvīpa. The reviving hell

In the individual perception [rang snang] of a person who has accumulated great negativity, there will be a long fall, head first, into a dark abyss ending up in the hell realms. As long as we experience this life as real and solid we will also experience the perceptions of the next life as real and solid. From the ultimate viewpoint, all perceptions are as unreal as dreams. As long as we remain caught up in our dreams, however, we continue to perceive them as real. Once we have arrived at the hell realms, we might have to experience the horrors of that perception for one intermediate aeon [bar gyi bskal pa].

At present, we can avoid creating the causes of suffering and therefore should be heedful not to create negative thoughts [bsam pa ngan pa]. Once we have taken rebirth in the hell realms, we experience tremendous suffering and we will not be able to free ourselves from this situation. Therefore, Buddha said that we should understand the nature of suffering and overcome its causes.

You must understand the truth of suffering,
Overcome the truth of origination,
Aim for the truth of cessation,
And apply the path to your mind.

Text sections 299 / stanza 58
People are ignorant about time and impermanence, never thinking or reflecting about the impermanent nature of their own lives. When they buy a car they consider how long it might last, but they never seriously consider how many years, months, days or minutes they themselves might last. People actually avoid the subject and fool themselves into believing that they still have a certain number of years left, a completely unsubstantiated assumption.

Life is unpredictable, and you should not presume that you have a certain number of years left. You cannot be sure that you will still be alive tomorrow; nor is there even any certainty that you will still be alive tonight. As life is that unpredictable and fragile, do not waste your time with any worldly activity. Sit down to practice dharma right now. Do not relax your mind [sems bag phab] in a state of laziness and do not stay at ease [bde bar ‘dug pa], living an ordinary, worldly life. Live every day as if it could be your last, without wasting precious time in anything other than dharma practice. Death is certain; only the time and circumstance is uncertain.

Text section 300:

Externally, humans as well as non-human can cause harm to a person’s life. Internally, a person can be harmed by an imbalance of the body elements. As Nāgārjuna says, life is even more impermanent than a water bubble. Take this thought to heart. On waking in the morning immediately take refuge to the three jewels, and resolve not to waste your day with worldly activities. Be grateful that you have another day to practice. Be aware that this could well be your last day.

Text sections 301-302 / stanza 59:

Nobody, not even the Buddha, can assure a wicked person that he has no reason to fear death and rebirth in the lower realms. If everybody has to die and if all wicked people will take rebirth in the hell realms, who can guarantee that I myself, an old evil doer, will not also go to hell after death? Nobody can. Furthermore, no one can guarantee that I will be liberated from the suffering of the hell realms once I have taken rebirth there. Resolve that the karma of negative deeds surely leads to the hell realms.

A Buddhist practitioner does not so much fear death itself but rather fears lacking sufficient time to practice the dharma before death comes. Teachers encourage their students to practice well in order to prepare for death. The teachings on the uncertainty of death are meant to inspire students to practice rather than to remain petrified in fear of death. With these teachings teachers are trying to make students understand that they should not waste time with worldly activities.

Although we know that we must die we continue to assume longevity. Really take to heart that people die while walking, talking, sitting, eating or sleeping. You could die any moment. Therefore, there is no time to waste. Think, “Death comes now; my time is up. There is nothing left to do but practice.” With this attitude you will accomplish the teachings. Otherwise, you will not.

The moment of death puts one’s practice to the test. When terminally ill, a real yogin will never complain and might even say, “I am completely fine; only this person who looks like me seems to be sick.” This is the state called happy to be sick, joyous to die [na dga' shi skyid bdag po]. When a yogin dies he knows that, once freed from the confines of the body, he will attain complete enlightenment. Therefore, he is joyful to become terminally ill, because he now knows for certain that the time of death is near.

Practice tirelessly until your mind is no longer overpowered by afflictions, until it is purified of all negativity. There is no time for leisure. Apply now the antidote to your former wicked deeds.

Text sections 303-305 / stanza 60:

Habitual tendencies are like rolled up paper. If you try to stretch out a piece of paper that has been rolled up for a while, it will roll itself back up. The habitual tendencies of being accustomed to a negative mindset are similar. In order to overcome these habitual patterns, we must repeatedly meditate on the teachings given in the Bodhisattva-caryāvātāra and thereby transform our negative habits [ngan goms] into positive patterns [bzang goms].

Attachment to the five sense pleasures is never fulfilled and can never be truly satisfied. Passion and desire only increase the more we chase after them. The five sense pleasures ['dod pa'i yul lnga] are sight [gzugs], sound [sgra], smell [dri], taste [ro] and touch [reg bya]. We have already enjoyed all of these many times over. The bliss of enjoying sense pleasures lasts only for a moment, vanishing in the second moment. ‘Defiling bliss’ [zag bcas kyi bde ba] is impermanent and fleeting.

When the objects of the five sense pleasures, the five sense organs [dbang po lnga] and our consciousness [mam shes] all come together, only one second of ‘defiling bliss’ is experienced before it vanishes on the spot. A second moment of the same bliss cannot be experienced since it has already vanished. One is left with nothing, since nothing of that experience of defiling bliss remains. Defiling bliss lacks any continuity [rgyun yod ma red]. Examining this situation closely we see that the experience of bliss lasts only a mini-second.

When we engage in sense pleasures we try to achieve the illusion of long-lasting enjoyment. In truth, however, a single blissful experience lasts only one mini-second before vanishing. Another mini-second of bliss may be experienced but it too will quickly fade away. Nevertheless, we continue indulging in sense pleasure, always pursuing the next moment of bliss. Each time we experience another moment of bliss it vanishes and we are left with nothing. There is no lasting second moment of bliss.

‘Defiling bliss’ is experienced only from moment to moment. Since it is impermanent it has the nature of suffering [sdug bsgal gyi rang bzhin]. Defiling bliss does not sustain the dream of eternal bliss but vanishes and leaves us disappointed, saddened and

moment of suffering, the suffering of being separated from bliss. Therefore, chasing after sense pleasure in search of defiling bliss is utterly pointless [snying po med pa]. Those who constantly run after the enjoyment of sense pleasures try to create as many short moments of defiling bliss as possible. But still they cannot avoid the suffering of being separated from defiling bliss the moment it ends.

Despite the transience of defiling bliss experiences, we spend our entire lives chasing after them. In the search for the bliss of sense pleasure, we commit all kinds of wrongdoing and undergo all sorts of suffering, hardship and trouble. We accumulate considerable bad karma, and we will suffer the consequences of these actions in our next life. We have destroyed both this life and the next chasing after sense pleasures and sense gratification.

By doing so we disregard the advice of our root guru [rtsa ba'i bla ma], that teacher who taught us about genuine bodhicitta, who pointed out the wisdom of egolessness to us, and through whom we have recognized buddha nature beyond any doubt. We have also disregarded the advice of the Buddha, who is the guru of the three worlds. The three worlds ['jig rten gsum] are: 1) the world of the gods living above the earth [sa bla lha'i 'jig rten], 2) the world of the human beings living on the earth [sa steng ma'i 'jig rten] and 3) the world of the nāgas living below the earth [sa 'og klu'i 'jig rten].

What is the advice of the Buddha and our root guru that we have disregarded? The advice is “Be virtuous! Abstain from a negative mindset and negative deeds!” Since we continue to commit the ten non-virtuous actions, and fail to develop bodhicitta, or to practice the six transcendental perfections, we have disregarded the advice of our root guru and the Buddha. Now, realizing our mistake, we must make the strong resolve to follow their advice.

We ordinary men have strong cravings for meat, alcohol and women. We will slaughter animals to satisfy our craving for meat. We consume alcohol and commit various misdeeds in the state of intoxication. Pursuing women, we engage in intrigues, deception and fighting. To begin freeing ourselves from the hold that sense pleasures have on us, we are advised to reduce our indulgence in them—to simplify our lives and to maintain discipline with regard to sense pleasures and cravings. A practitioner should not aim to completely eliminate the enjoyment of sense pleasures, which would lead to a state of total sense deprivation, but to cut his attachment and craving while enjoying them. As Tilopa said:
You are fettered by attachment, not by perception.
Overcome attachment, Tilopa!
snang bas ma ching zhen pas ching zhen pa spong cig ti lo pa

Once free from all attachment, there is no difference for a practitioner whether he lives under a tree, outdoors as a renunciant, or as a king in a palace. A true yogin can enjoy the five sense pleasures without attachment. Since he does not pursue sense pleasure, he would never, even at the cost of his life, commit any non-virtuous action in its pursuit. For a true yogin, the life of a beggar and the life of a king are equal. If he has riches, he will use them to ease the suffering of beings and to make offerings to the three jewels. Unlike us, he is not fettered by sense pleasures.

We, in the process of unwinding from samsara, should completely cut all activities of non-virtuous and negative deeds in the pursuit of sense pleasures. We should at least cut down on our involvement with them. The pursuit of sense pleasures has no end. You can never get enough.

Craving and clinging [sred len] are the real root of samsara. Craving is the motivation, the driving force [kun slong], while clinging is the application [sbyor ba], the actual doing. Their relationship is like that of intent [bsam pa] and action [sbyor ba]. All forms of non-virtuous action [mi dge ba] and negativity [sdig pa] are based on them. Craving and clinging cause us to be attached to happiness and frightened of suffering. They propel us into the play of hope and fear, acceptance and rejection. Craving and clinging are based on delusion [gti mug] and ignorance [ma rig pa]. Deluded and ignorant about buddha nature, about emptiness, one holds on to an identity even though there is no identity. That is called ego-clinging.

Craving and clinging [sred len] are only truly destroyed when the wisdom of egolessness is fully realized. Once free of craving and clinging, we will no longer experience the fruitions of our previously accumulated karma, since there is no experiencer of karma left [las myong mkhan med pa]. When there is no ego-clinging left, we are free from fixations. The root of samsara has been purified [’khor ba’i rtsa ba dag tshar red].

Such a yogin will still use his five sense organs to see, hear, smell, taste and touch, but his ‘enjoyment’ is no longer called ‘enjoyment of the five sense pleasures’ [’dod pa’i yon tan Inga la longs spyod pa]. Having realized egolessness, for him ‘the sense pleasures arise as an ornamentation’ [’dod pa’i yon tan Inga rgyan du ’char ba]. Such enjoyment of the sense pleasures is free from all attachment and thus does not create any further karma.
Text sections 308-309 / stanza 61:

Not only did your former attachment to sense pleasures bring you no happiness, but it also formed the basis for many misdeeds. You might think, “At the time of death my beloved ones and friends will help me.” However, when the time to die comes, you will go, naked and alone, with none of your friends and possessions. You cannot even take your own body with you. Your life force [tshe srog] will burst like a water bubble. You will have to face the horrors of death, of the intermediate state, and the next life in the three lower realms all by yourself. Lacking the power of self-determination [rang dbang med par], you will go to an uncertain destination, impelled by your non-virtuous actions [mi dge ba'i las kyi 'phen pa], which will determine where you will take rebirth within samsara’s lower realms.

Text sections 310-312 / stanza 62:

What really hurts you at the time of death is the sum total of all the wicked deeds you committed due to attachment to friends and aversion to enemies. If your non-virtuous actions are the cause of harm, then what is the method for surely freeing yourself from them? Confession and the practice of virtue.

Only when you have the faith of conviction [yid ches kyi dad pa] in the law of karma, in virtue and non-virtue, will you be able to practice the power of regret, the power of the antidote, and the power of resolve. Having faith of conviction in karma is called the ‘perfect view of a worldly person’ ['jig rten yang dag pa'i lta ba]. A person who is endowed with such faith from the bottom of his heart will naturally abstain from negative deeds and naturally practice virtue. Thus, he is practicing the power of the applied antidote.

Before one can dye the wool of sheep, it must be washed a few times to get the fat and dirt out of it. Only then will the dye be absorbed by the wool. If you try to dye unwashed wool, the wool will not absorb the dye. As in this example, you must first purify your mind of all negative deeds and non-virtuous actions, then the qualities of study, contemplation and meditation will arise. This is another reason for endeavoring to purify negative deeds.

Text sections 313-316 / stanza 63:

All misdeeds [nyes pa] or negative deeds [sdig pa] are grouped into two categories: negative deeds of violating a natural law and negative deeds of breaking established rules.

Negative deeds of violating a natural law [rang bzhin gyi sdig pa] are violations of the ten virtuous actions [mi dge ba bcu], which are natural laws. These are killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, divisive speech, harsh speech, idle chatter, covetousness, harmful intent and wrong views. Regardless of who has committed any of the ten non-virtuous actions, whether or not he has taken the vow to abstain from such actions, he has committed a natural misdeed.

*Negative deeds of breaking an established rule [bcas pa’i sdig pa]*164 refers to breaking precepts that have been pronounced and established by the Buddha. A practitioner who commits himself to following these established rules and then breaks them, has committed the misdeed of breaking an established rule. For example, a monk must follow the established rule of not eating after mid-day. If he does so, he breaks a rule that the Buddha established for monks, and creates negative karma. Conversely, if a monk keeps an established rule, he accumulates merit. This is the power of the precept.

If a lay person eats at night, he does not break any established rule and generates no negative karma. He has not taken this particular precept as his training and therefore does not break it by eating at night. While a monk accumulates merit by keeping that precept as his training, a lay person will not accumulate merit if he does not eat at night, as he has not committed to follow this particular precept.

An established rule [bcas khrims] is a rule from the monk’s codex, the vinaya, which is observed by monks or lay practitioners who are in possession of these precepts. These are rules of training that the Buddha established in order to support the virtuous lifestyle of practitioners [nyams len pa].

An unspoken misdeed of violating a natural law [rang bzhin gyi kha na ma tho ba] refers to any deed which creates negative karma. This mainly refers to the ten non-virtuous actions such as killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying and the like, which are natural negative deeds, not the rules of trainings established by the Buddha for his followers.

Natural discipline [rang bzhin gyi tshul khrims]: By refraining from the ten non-virtuous actions, one is practicing a discipline which naturally leads to merit. Such practice does not depend on taking precepts although if one embraces this conduct with precepts, it will greatly increase one’s merit. This kind of discipline is like the advice, “Don’t drink poison. If you drink poison you will get sick.” Whoever engages in the ten nonvirtuous actions will take rebirth in unhappy states in samsara.

Fully ordained monks have to keep 253 precepts. Any monk or fully ordained monk, who is careless about the minor precepts will sooner or later break the major rules and bring great suffering upon himself. The established rules are like a protective bamboo fence planted around a mango grove. If the bamboo fence is cut down, the mango grove will be damaged. Therefore, monks should not take lightly even the minor established rules, since they are designed to protect the major precepts.

At the time of Buddha Kāśyapa ['od srung] the robe of a monk got caught in a big elapattra tree. He became very angry and cut the tree down. As a result of this, he took rebirth as a nāga with the body of a huge serpent several leagues long. On his head grew a great elapattra tree, crushing him with its weight, its roots crawling with insects which caused him terrible suffering. Thus, as the result of breaking an established rule, the monk had to endure great suffering.

We have been ignorant like a deluded child [rmongs pa'i byis pa] in regard to what should be done and what should be avoided [blang dor]. We have fallen under the power of ignorance [mi shes pa], vagueness [mi gsal ba] and foolishness [gti mug] and have thus committed unspoken misdeeds of violating natural laws [rang bzhin gyi kha na ma tho ba] and negative deeds of breaking established rules [bcas pa'i sdig pa].

Unreported misdeed [kha na ma tho ba] actually means ‘a misdeed that had been kept secret’, ‘a misdeed that was left untold’, literally, ‘something that has not reached the mouth’, ‘something impossible to mention’ [kha nang la brjod mi rung ba], ‘something that cannot be mentioned’ [kha thog tu phud mi phod pa] due to embarrassment [ngo tsha] or inauspiciousness [bkra mi shes pa]. It is something that makes the mouth dirty [kha gtsog] when mentioned. Buddhist practitioners, particularly monks, must confess all their misdeeds by admitting them openly and spelling them out. Whatever is left untold and not openly admitted has not been confessed.

Having thus identified your negative deeds, you confess them in the direct presence of the compassionate protectors, the buddhas and bodhisattvas, whom you mentally visualize [yid kyis mngon sum du ‘god nas] as being in the sky in front of you. You offer confession with utter sincerity, your mind filled with deep regret about your mistakes. Offer prostrations repeatedly to the buddhas and bodhisattvas, touching your forehead to the ground. Say, ‘I, the fool, have committed all these negative deeds and downfalls.’ Acknowledging your former misdeeds, say, “Revealing each misdeed, one after the other, I confess without hiding or concealing anything.” Confessing like this will relieve you of the burden of former misdeeds and your mind will be purified and joyous.

You must promise to never repeat these deeds again. You must remove all this negativity from your system as if it were poison. Feel deep regret and wish to eliminate your former misdeeds. Confession may be offered in front of a stūpa, a statue of the Buddha, or by simply visualizing the Buddha and the bodhisattvas in front of you.

Deluded beings like ourselves cannot actually see the buddhas and bodhisattvas. Nevertheless, they can perceive us without hindrance due to their wisdom perception [ye shes kyi gzigs pa], which is beyond time and distance. Even if they dwell countless 165 See Words of My Perfect Teacher, page 124.

world systems away [grangs med ’jig rten pha rol nas], they perceive us directly [mgon sum du mkhyen pa].

Text section 321 / stanza 65 first part:

You should feel compassion toward all beings when you remember all the horrible things you have done to them. Feel deep sorrow and regret for your actions. Bring to mind the horrible consequences you have brought upon yourself by causing so much suffering to others. All these deeds will ripen on you. All your negative deeds will come back to you.

Speak directly to the buddhas and bodhisattvas: “Guides, buddhas and bodhisattvas, all these negative deeds that I hold in my mind, these unspoken misdeeds of violating natural and established rules, I acknowledge them to be mistakes [nongs pa].166 Please accept me, the mistaken one [nyes pa can], the one at fault [nongs pa can], and look kindly upon me with your great compassion.”

Text section 322 / stanza 65 second part:

While Minyag Kunzang167 classifies stanza 65 in its entirety as covering the power of resolve [sor chud pa’i stobs], Khenpo Kunpal treats only the last two lines as the power of resolve.168

Wicked deeds and non-virtuous actions are called bad conduct [spyod pa ngan pa]. Our non-virtuous actions cause our perception of the world to turn from good to bad, from light to darkness. Wicked deeds have no good qualities because they cause suffering to ourselves and other sentient beings. We therefore pledge to abstain from them in the future. This is the power of resolve. We should all practice the ten virtuous actions for our own good and for the good of others.
After offering confession, imagine that infinite multicolored light rays come from the bodies of the buddhas and bodhisattvas, clearing away all your former misdeeds. Generate the confidence that your negative deeds have been purified. At the time of your death you should be free from regrets. Such regret would only lead to a very bad rebirth.

You might ask, “How can I be certain that my negative deeds have been purified?” That you can see from your dreams. Many signs indicating the purification of negative deeds manifest in dreams. These include dreaming of white flowers, being given a flower garland, flying through the sky, washing yourself in an ocean, being honored and praised by many people, drinking milk, having a vivid dream of the Buddha or Vajrasattva, and so forth.

Another indication that your misdeeds have been purified is that the qualities of study, contemplation and meditation will become stronger and your mind will become increasingly pure [sems ḍvangs ma]. As your wisdom-knowledge [shes rab] grows, you come to understand the suffering of samsara. The understanding of impermanence will remain in your mind at all times, and you will have a strong sense of renunciation in your heart. True renunciation arises through wisdom-knowledge alone. Until you really experience the pointlessness of all sansāric activities, you will never have true renunciation.

Seeing clearly the suffering of all beings, you will naturally develop compassion for them and wish to liberate them from this endless circle of suffering. Your devotion to the Buddha and your root guru will be unwavering and practicing meditation will become easy and joyful. Renunciation has the nature of rejection and devotion the nature of acceptance. In this way these positive qualities still retain a taint of affliction, and a practitioner needs to know how to overcome these subtle afflictions.

Recite the lines of confession from the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra over and over again since they contain all the necessary knowledge concerning confession. Be aware, however, that the sūtra style of confession will decrease and purify your negative deeds to some extent, but will not utterly eradicate them. Through the tantric meditation on Vajrasattva your confession will bring about greater purification, but only the genuine recognition of buddha nature will utterly eradicate your negative deeds. One moment of genuine recognition purifies countless aeons of negative karma. In order to have a genuine recognition of buddha nature you must first purify misdeeds and obscurations through sūtra and tantra-style confession practices.

Without relying on these techniques, you will not be able to recognize your buddha nature since your obscurations are still too strong. Confession creates the conducive conditions for non-conceptual wisdom to arise in your mind.

Text section 323:

There are two kinds of practitioners: those who hoist the victory banner of the dharma and those who bring down the victory banner of māra. The first type are perfect practitioners who commit no negative deeds whatsoever but practice only virtue. The second type are those practitioners who have accumulated negative deeds but purify them through confessions.

Shantideva’s aim is to teach us how to uncover ‘the hidden Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra’ we all carry in our minds. When you put these teachings into practice, you will see that they are words of truth. Nothing in this book is removed from human experience.

Although the text includes difficult passages, continuous study, contemplation and practice will remove one’s doubts and misunderstandings.

You should ask your teachers again and again about the meaning of the text until all your doubts are gone. If you leave certain parts of the text as ‘obscure and strange’, these unresolved doubts will eventually harm your virtuous intentions. Many people who begin as ardent and diligent Buddhist practitioners turn to another religion or path after a few years. This results directly from not addressing all doubts and unresolved issues. A serious student must continue asking questions until all his doubts have been clarified. Do not be a superficial practitioner. Tackle the difficult passages of the text right away. Apply the teachings to your daily life.

Text section 324:

The essence of heedfulness [bag yod] is being careful about what should be adopted or avoided. A heedful practitioner is very careful to practice only what is defined as virtue and tries to avoid and overcome all that is considered non-virtue. Those who have not received teachings from a qualified master are ignorant about virtue and non-virtue and therefore are heedless [bag med] in their conduct of body, speech and mind. Only the guidance of a master can teach one how to practice virtue and how to avoid non-virtue. Someone who, though formerly heedless, has become heedful in his conduct through the kindness of a master, is considered to be beautiful, like the full moon which has been freed of clouds. Nanda [dga’ bo], Angulimāla [sor phreng / sor mo’i phreng ba / sor ’phreng can], Darshaka [mthong ldan]169 and Udayana [bde byed] are examples of famous students of the Buddha who were at first heedless and then became exemplary practitioners.

Nanda was a lustful Skakya youth and a half-brother [gcung] of the Buddha. Though he was ordained by the Buddha, he was so attached to his wife that he thought of her day and night and could not practice virtue. After the Buddha revealed the horrors of the hell realms to him, Nanda became so terrified that he began to meditate and became an arhat. Buddha predicted that Nanda would become foremost among those who control their sense gates [dbang po’i sgo bsdams pa mams kyi mchog tu lung bstan to].170

Ahinsaka Angulimāla [mi gdung ba sor phreng can] was the son of a brahmin who served at the court of King Prasenajit [gsal rgyal]. Ahinsaka was deceived by a teacher who directed him onto a non-dharmic path, telling him that by killing one thousand human beings and making a garland of fingers he would be practicing the genuine dharma. Angulimāla went to the forest of Kosala, slew travelers and took a finger from each of his victims. He threaded the finger bones and wore them as a garland.

Thus he became known as Angulimāla, ‘Finger Garland’. When Angulimāla had killed 999 people, he attempted to kill the Buddha as his final victim. Instead the Buddha converted him to the genuine dharma and later ordained him. Eventually, Angulimāla reached the level of an arhat and was praised by the Buddha to be the foremost among those with sharp faculties [bcom ldan ’das kyi dbang po mon po mams kyi mchog ni sor phreng can yin no zhes bsngags so].171

Darshaka also known as Ajātashatru fell under the bad influence of Devadatta [lhas sbyin] and committed many wicked deeds, including killing his father, King Bimbisāra [gzugs can snying po]. Later, when Ajātashatru had gained faith in the Buddha, he repented his wrong-doing and was able to escape the karmic ripening of his deeds. He became one of Buddha’s foremost faithful lay practitioners [dge bsnyen].172

Udayana murdered his own mother because she had prevented him from sleeping with another man’s wife. Although he received full monk ordination [dge sloyng], he was expelled by the sangha when the sangha learned that he had committed such a crime with immediate retribution. He settled in a border country and erected a temple.

A large number of monks eventually took up residence there, and Udayana acted as their elder. Although after his death Udayana was born in hell as the consequence of his crime with immediate retribution, he did not remain there for long. He was again

Text section 325:

The four sections covered in the second chapter of the Bodhisattva-caryāvatāra are: the section on presenting offerings, the section on paying respect, the section on going for refuge and the section on confessing negative deeds. The primary focus of this chapter is how to confess negativity.
